writing. It was an age of oral traditions rather than writing. In Luke 1: 1-4, there is a very clear intimation that an early effort had been made—probably shortly after the ascension—to set forth a formal statement of Christ's ministry, and that the facts had been related by eye witnesses and ministers (disciples), who were familiar with the events from the beginning of the public career of Jesus. Westcott writes: "So long as the first witnesses survived, so long the (Gospel) tradition was confirmed within the bounds of their testimony: when they passed away it was already fixed in writing."

E. H., Thornton, Iowa. The Seer of Revelation appears to have had his visions in the form of a series of scenes, like a great panorama. Toward the close of these scenes comes the vision of "the beast" (Rev. 13). The last verse in the chapter is capable of two interpretations. "Here is wisdom" is held by some to mean that divine or spiritual wisdom which is "the army against the second beast, as patience and faith are the army against the first"; or, according to other interpreters, it may mean that spiritual wisdom is needed to solve this great mystery of wickedness, so that we may not be beguiled by it. A great deal has been written concerning the Beast, and there have been many attempts at identification; but none is accepted as thoroughly satisfactory. The history of these investigations is too complicated and conflicting to be discussed in the Mail-Bag.

N. E. J., Sac City, Iowa. The term "moral awakening" is usually employed to designate the first work of the Holy Spirit in conversion, that is—the work of conviction. It is also applied to the result of revivals of religion, in which many of the indifferent are aroused to a sense of their spiritual danger. It may be said briefly to be the conviction of sin and the experience of sorrow and contrition, followed by the desire for forgiveness and a determination, with divine help, to lead a better life. Biblical instances of spiritual awakening are the turning-point in the life of the prodigal; the wonderful experience of Paul on the road to Damascus, etc. More familiar are the frequent cases in which the sinner, under Gospel preaching, suddenly sees the errors of his ways and comes to the Saviour for deliverance.

M. F. D., Nebraska. The passage in John 15: 4 is interpreted to mean that, as all spiritual fruitfulness has been ascribed to "the mutual inhabitation and living active interpenetration, so to speak, of Christ and his disciples," so the keeping up of this vital connection is held to be essential to continued fruitfulness. In the whole discourse, the oneness of Christ and his people is set forth in a figure familiar to the Jews—the figure of the vine, with Christ as the true or central stem, and his disciples as the branches. According as they are spiritually and vitally connected with him, they are fruitful or the reverse. The fruit is loving obedience, and the spirit and work of true discipleship.

J. W. C., Roseville, Ill. This correspondent, referring to the proposed relinquishment of political and territorial rights in the Philippines by the United States Government, cites another case of the kind given by Gibbon as follows: "The resignation of all the eastern conquest of Trajan was the first measure of his reign. (Hadrian's.) He restored to the Parthians the election of an independent sovereign, and withdrew the Roman garrisons from the provinces."

F. L., Yale, Mich., and Reader, Lewisburg, Pa. 1. We suggest for the use of any who are interested in various forms for grace at table for home meals and on other occasions (for adults and children), the book Table Graces for Daily Use, Special Days and Occasions, published by M. E. Munson, Bible House, New York. 2. The number of Jews in the world is estimated at 11,300,000, divided as follows: Australasia, 17,000; Africa, 400,000; America, 1,200,000; Europe, 9,000,000, of whom 2,100,000 are in Austria-Hungary and 5,400,000 in Russia.

Reader, Madison, Wis. 1. Every great thought, like a seed dropped in the ground, requires time to mature. There is evidence that thoughtful people are impressed with the project of world federation, but divine help is needed to bring it to pass. 2. The virtues you have enumerated, if by any possibility they could be found combined in a single individual, would assuredly mark an admirable character; yet they are not to be regarded as exclusively Christian virtues. We believe many of them are found in such men as Cicero, Plato, Epicurus and others, Stoic and pagan.

H. L. H., a reader in Philadelphia, sends us this letter, which will interest many of our oldest subscribers: "The enclosed subscription is sent in memory of my dear father and mother, who were regular readers of the Christian Herald, as my sister was also. I felt that by having the papers sent in their names, it is, as it were, a weekly message from them. Mother died in November, 1911, and in 1913 father subscribed in memory of her; but since then (March, 1914) father has also left this earth to join mother. We are happy to be able to say that they both left an inspiration in us of love for the Christian Herald. I tell you these facts to cheer you in the good work, for I know you must love to tell the 'old, old story,' or you would not be able to present the truth to win others in the way you do." We believe there are many families in which love for the Christian Herald has been handed down from parents to children as a precious legacy. To us such a letter is in itself a whole sermon of encouragement.

C. F. B., Howell, Mich. If we could answer your question, we would be wiser than any mortal who ever lived. Prescience, or foreknowledge, is an attribute of the perfect divine nature, but as one eminent writer says, "as man has no analogous faculty, it is difficult if not impossible for us to conceive of God's prescience. Our knowledge of all future things is so obscure and inferential that it is vain for us to try to fathom God's foreknowledge of all things."

Mrs. L. A. H., Landersville, Pa. The crown of thorns which was placed upon the brow of Christ is believed to have been either of the thorny species known as the coppars spinosae, or the Arabian nubk. Some writers hold that it may have been the plant known as the southern buckthorn. There is a legend that Empress Helena recovered the thorny crown and preserved it as a sacred relic. Several treatises have been written about it, but nothing definite can be stated.

Miscellaneous

H. P., Koskia, Idaho. The Christian Herald is not a political paper.

F. E., Shannon City, Iowa. We should require further information before forming an opinion on the subject.

Reader, Pa., would like to learn, from some other reader if possible, the name of the author of the quotation "The sins we do by two and two shall be paid for one by one."

A. C. J., Lorimer, La. It is impossible to forecast the future of Palestine in connection with the present war, with any reasonable degree of certainty. In certain events, it might be made an independent neutral state, as some have suggested. Speculation at present, however, would seem to be premature.

M. J. L., Cupid, N. B. 1. To find the area of a circle multiply the diameter by 3.1416. 2. "O. K." comes from a humorous spelling of "All Correct." Some one (among others, Andrew Jackson is given the credit) is said to have spelled it "Oll Korrek," and the first letters of the words of this old joke have come into general use.

J. G. D., White Rock, Me. There is a great variety of opinion among authorities concerning the date of the Exodus. Hales places it in 1648 B.C.; Usher, 1491; Bunsen, 1320; Poole, 1652. It is an open question. Under the circumstances, it is impossible to reconcile individual dates. The Mail-Bag can simply give the best authorities available.

Mrs. M. D. M., Waco, Texas. The body, to be a fit temple of the Holy Spirit, should be kept free from taint of sin and vice. Not for our own sake only, but for the sake of others, who might be influenced by our example, we should strive to avoid even the appearance of evil and to conquer those habits that degrade the body and cloud the mind.

H. R., Plymouth, Mich. In Psalms 104: 5 and preceding verses, the writer speaks of God's essential glory and also that displayed by his mighty work, which afford grounds for praise. The earth is firmly fixed by his power, but the term used (verse 5) does not imply that it is eternal, but rather "age-lasting." The same characterization applies to the last clause of Eccles. 1: 4.

W. B. E., Hot Springs, S. D. 1. Presbyterian, we believe. 2. One of the strange and inexplicable things about the present war is that all the nations are appealing to God for victory, each against the other. How this attitude can be justified, no one can understand. Our own attitude as a nation is that of a neutral. God will bring light out of the darkness in his own good time.

S. R. B., Oklahoma. Interest is implied in every debt, unless stipulated to the contrary. Talk the matter over frankly with your creditor; tell him you are able to pay the principal, but not the interest. Since, by special arrangement, payment of interest is sometimes not required, there would be no impropriety, in case it is necessary to do so, in asking him to forego payment of interest on his loan to you.

Subscriber, Coal Creek, Colo. On general principles, it is well to furnish to children such amusements as will keep them at home and prevent their straying into doubtful places. Pool rooms, entirely apart from the merit of the game, are unfortunately associated with the saloon, and to teach children to become lovers of pool is to put them in the way of temptation. We should avoid even the appearance of evil.

The Good Housekeeper

She takes pride in discovering the better things in her chosen field of household management. She likes Crisco because it is one of these better things.

She has found it an improvement over every other product in use for frying, shortening and cake-making.

CRISCO

For Frying—For Shortening
For Cake Making

It costs much less than butter—generally about half. It is more digestible than even the best of lard—and its average year-round cost is lower.

It is more convenient than either butter or lard—because it can be kept indefinitely in the ordinary kitchen temperature without getting too soft or too hard, or turning rancid.

It reaches the proper frying heat without causing any of the smoke that makes cooking disagreeable and leaves odors in the kitchen.

The uses and advantages of Crisco are clearly shown in a book which will be sent you on receipt of 2-cent stamps. The book also contains a different dinner menu every day in the year, and 615 recipes gathered and tested in actual practice by the well-known cooking expert Marion Harris Neil. "WITHHOLD NOT THY HAND"

A HOUSEWIFE—this is a true incident—had started a batch of bread. The dough was in the mixer to rise when she was asked to go to her sister's for the day because of some need. On an impulse of economy she put her dough in an aluminum pail, covered it, put it on her arm and started on her visit. The mass began to rise, and she was put to some confusion in disciplining it. When she reached her sister's home she let the lump follow its bent, and before returning home had baked a half-dozen delicious loaves of bread.

ORPHAN GIRLS AT THEIR KNITTING

This great round ball of matter which we call the earth is being juggled about considerably just at present. But there has been set to work in our world an influence that goes right on performing its appointed task regardless of changing conditions about it. The Gospel of the Son of God continues quietly to work its transforming power. This is a time when Christians should look well to all established agencies for propagating this wonderful Gospel of divine love. The little story told above is almost too simple for the purpose, perhaps, but yet it may suffice. In due time, as the perfected loaves of bread appeared on the table, so the perfect results of our human efforts to do the will of God among men will be revealed. And it is in that light that we have always regarded the interesting and beautiful work being done for the orphans under our care in China. We look upon that company of a thousand souls as in especial preparation for the time when all China shall begin to ask "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" We know the work seems tedious sometimes; we know it requires faith to see the great possibilities for good in it; we know that it is difficult to feel the same tender interest in those little foreigners so far away as we might expect to feel in a similar company right here at home. Yet, as has been pointed out again and again, we believe there was a divine purpose in bringing those children to our doors, and we gladly go forward with their support and training. We think no one missionary enterprise of the Christian Herald has had a warmer-hearted co-operation from our readers than this. You have taken care of these children with most commendable generosity. Whatever your individual gifts have been, you are a sharer in the work they shall do for the cause of Christ.

So we renew our reminder at this time that another quarter's remittance of five thousand dollars is about due. We ask all of our friends who feel they can make some sacrifice in behalf of these Chinese boys and girls, whose very living depends upon us, to make a gift now for this purpose. Let your gifts come as freely and as promptly as possible, and follow them with thoughts about the work and prayers for its success. (Look up Eccles. 11: 1-6.)

the prisoners as mere beasts from whom the greatest possible amount of labor should be exacted. I remember one man who was whipped repeatedly for failing to make his task. This man had been put at a machine to make trousers. Now, there are some men who simply cannot acquire the knack of doing certain work. This man, H—, was one of those fellows. They found it was impossible to teach him to make trousers, so they were trying to teach him to make women's skirts on a sewing machine. For a long time he could not seem to manage it, and during that time he was whipped repeatedly. Finally, he got so that he could stitch pretty well, but even then he could not finish his task in time. The first time they punished him for being short on his task he was hung upon the cell door for half an hour. In a day or two there was another report against him for being short on his task. This being the second offense, they hung him up for five hours. The third time they whipped him for it. This happened again and again with many prisoners. The contractors paid the state 62 1/2 cents a day for the work of each man. A man worked nine or ten hours a day for the contractors. Each contractor has his foreman inside the prison. It is the contractor who makes the task, and if the man is short the contractor's foreman reports it. The state has a guard in each department of each shop, and this guard is supposed to stand between the prisoner and the contractor. In each case of dispute, the matter is referred to the captain of the guard. I know of cases where only nine hours were allowed to a man to do what would require fifteen hours to accomplish. Naturally he was short of his task, and was punished. Of course abuses of the task system are flagrant. A man is given a task which may take him two weeks to accomplish. If he accomplishes more than the task during the two weeks he is supposed to be paid for it. This is to encourage him to work as hard as possible. They let him run along, making a little extra money for a while; then the contractor advances the amount of the task up to the greatest quantity of work which the man has accomplished during the time allowed. He now has to work regularly as fast as he formerly worked in trying to accomplish more than his task. This might seem to encourage a man never to do more than his task. However, the foreman sees to that. If the prisoner just accomplishes the task and no more, the foreman will complain that he is not speeding up; whereupon it is up to the prisoner to produce more work or be punished.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city." Prov. 16: 32.

We make great mistakes in our judgments of character. Too often the man who flies into a violent passion, storms and swears and stamps in unrestrained fury, is looked on as the strong man; whereas he who takes insult or violence calmly and quietly is regarded as weak—negligible if not despicable. But this verdict is altogether erroneous. It needs no particular strength to give vent to the passion that boils within. Any kettle-lid will shake and rattle when the water boils. But to keep back the bitter answer and repress the cutting repartee; not to revile when you are reviled, not to threaten when you are wrongly reproached—that takes all the strength of the strong. When a converted pugilist was struck a stinging blow by one who would not have dared to touch him in the old days, he quietly replied: "God bless thee, lad, I'll pray for thee." The strength that others might have poured out in word or blow, became a moral and spiritual dynamic, which convicted his assailant of sin, and brought him back some days afterwards to ask forgiveness. Elijah was a man of like passions with us, but he prayed. Let us, like him, turn passion into prayer. If you cannot rule yourself, you cannot take or rule cities; but to master yourself is to be a king.

The Place Will Come to You

By Amos R. Wells

"HOW shall this man save us?" sneered the children of Belial when Saul was crowned; and they brought him no presents. But the kingly young man held his peace and went back to his fields.

Once a naturalist saw a meadow mouse try to get a stalk of wheat, whose kernels were far above him. He bit through the stalk as high up as he could reach, and it fell, but was still held upright by the other stalks. Again the mouse bit it through and again it fell, remaining upright, the grains far out of reach. In this way he bit off five lengths of stalk before he brought the kernels within reach of his paws. So will the wise man, like Saul, be patient and live his life faithfully from day to day. All the time his success is coming nearer, and at last it will be within his grasp.

The threat of Nahash to blind all the men of Jabesh was cruel and barbarous; but can we point our fingers at him? Listen to the talk of men in the European war. In England and France it is all of crippling Germany, of making her bite the dust; in Germany it is all of ruining England and France irretrievably. Yes, and in our own land do not business competitors seek to maim one another, and to destroy one another? Are we so much better than the Ammonites?

The men of Benjamin wept when they heard the news, and half their tears were for themselves. Once a blind man in St. Louis was walking briskly along a familiar street when some one bumped into him and knocked off his hat. At once he began to berate the stranger for his carelessness in running into a blind man, and commanded him to pick up his hat. "I can't," said the other mildly, "for I too am blind." The first man stretched out his hands, found the other, and fell on his neck weeping. Thus a sense of their common misery and peril made the Israelites weep for their endangered brethren. They had learned the truth that Epictetus expressed: "The universe is but one great city, full of beloved ones."

While the people were weeping Saul was afire with righteous indignation. Crawford, the missionary to Africa, tells of a fight with a lion in which one of his workmen engaged. The man and the lion wrestled, and at last the man got on top of the lion and pinned his head to the ground while he roared for help. A big boy came running with a hoe. The boy watched for a minute, but at last ventured to beat the head of the enraged beast with the hoe. Harder and harder he beat, the lion roaring fiercely, and at last he broke the lion's skull. That was Saul's way of attacking an evil—not with polite petitions and ceremonious bows, but with downright blows, full of splendid and well-merited anger.

There was something splendid also in the vigorous summons which Saul sent up and down the land. After the outbreak of the great European war the young men of England saw the walls glaring with big posters: "Your King and Country Need You!" That summons led hundreds and thousands of them to join the army and march into deadly peril. It was such a summons that Saul issued, and such a call is constantly made by the church of God in the name of Jesus Christ.

"We are coming," Saul sent word to the desperate men of Jabesh-gilead; "tomorrow ye shall have help." Billy Sunday, weary after one of his great efforts, was awakened by a cashier, who insisted on seeing him and confessing that he had robbed his employer of $700. The next day Sunday faced the employer and told him the truth. He was for instant dismissal, but Sunday made him give the repentant fellow another chance. And after he had agreed to do so, Sunday handed him his own check for $700. That was help of the right kind, help all around, help that made for lasting character and happiness. It is this help that every Christian should be giving to the beleaguered men of every Jabesh-gilead.

No wonder, after this, that Saul's enraptured friends wished to take vengeance on the sons of Belial that had refused to recognize him as king; but Saul proved his kingship by forgiving them. And the moral of it all for us? Listen to Spurgeon: "Be ready. Your business is to be ready. Have your tools well sharpened, and know how to handle them. The place will come to you."

Member of Syria Mission

JABESH-GILEAD. One of the most exciting journeys I ever took in Palestine, years ago, when traveling east of the Jordan was forbidden by the government and unsafe, was to visit the site of Jabesh-Gilead. We camped at Golan, one of the cities of refuge, visited Gadara and Jerash and wished to make our way homeward by Jabesh-Gilead, whose brave inhabitants had crossed the Jordan by night and stolen the body of Saul from the wall of Bethshean, where it had been nailed in derision by those who killed him. We crossed the Jordan by the same dangerous ford and made most of the rough journey west of the lonely valley by night. It gave us a new conception of these East Jordan people who had made the double journey over and back with the dead body so many centuries before. The story of the journey is found in a little volume by the Rev. George C. Doolittle, one of our party of three, entitled Forbidden Paths in the Land of Og (F. H. Revell & Co.). Political affairs were such in 1899 that he could not publish it over his own name.

Saul had been chosen by Samuel and anointed as king by him in secret. He had yet to gain his kingdom by some feat of prowess which would arouse the enthusiasm of his own tribe and of all Israel. Apparently some one knew of his anointing and his having been chosen, but evidently (verse 12) expressed their unwillingness to recognize him as king.

Messengers came from Jabesh-Gilead telling the sad story of their oppression by the Amorites, a migratory tribe of Hebraic people, descendants of Lot through Ben-Ammi, living

What My Pupils Say:

"Every one notices the change in my complexion. It has lost that yellow color."

"Just think what you have done for me. Last year I weighed 124 lbs. this year 116, and have not gained an ounce back. I am not wrinkled either. I feel so young and strong, no rheumatism, or sluggish liver. I can breathe now, too. It is surprising how easily I did it. I feel 15 years younger."

"Just think! I have not had a pill or a cathartic since I began, and I used to take one every night."

"My weight has increased 30 lbs. I don't know what indigestion is any more, and my nerves are so rested! I sleep like a baby."

"Miss Cocroft, I have taken off my glasses and my catarrh is so much better. Isn't that good?"

"I feel as if I could look every man, woman and child in the face with the feeling that I am growing—spiritually, physically and mentally. Really I am a stronger, better woman. I don't know how to tell you or to thank you."

"Reports like these come to me every day. Do you wonder I want to help every woman to vibrant health and happiness? Write me your faults of health or figure."

Your correspondence is held in strict confidence. If I cannot help you I will tell you what will.

My interesting book tells how to stand and walk correctly and contains other information of vital interest to women. You are welcome to it. Write for it. It is FREE. THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Tests of My Christianity

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic for March 14. Matt. 10: 16-31 (An honorary members' meeting)

WHEN you would get some gain or advantage by swerving a little from the truth or the right—are you a Christian then?

When you have the opportunity of choosing between a benefit to yourself and a benefit to some one else—are you a Christian then?

When things occur in your home, or school, or office, that would tend to make you impatient and tempt you to be unkind—are you a Christian then?

When some one is despondent or wavering and needs a comforting, strengthening friend—are you a Christian then?

When the temptation comes to forsake a principle because of opposition or ridicule—are you a Christian then?

When some one is looking wistfully your way to see if religion really makes people glad and kind and patient and courageous and triumphant—are you a Christian then?

When the Holy Spirit suggests some act or word that might win some one to Jesus or strengthen some one in the Way—are you a Christian then?

When a piece of hard work needs to be done and the others who have been interested are inclined to give up and back out—are you a Christian then?

Epworthians as Dyke-Builders Against Rum

Epworth League Topic for March 14. Isa. 59: 19 (A.V.); Neh. 2: 17-20; 4: 7-9; 6: 15, 16

ONE of the best things you could do to help build the dyke against rum in your locality would be to write to Congressman Richmond Pearson Hobson at Washington and ask him to have mailed to you a number of copies of his recent speech in the House of Representatives in favor of a prohibition amendment to the Constitution. It will stir the souls of all who read it, shake the opponents of prohibition in your locality and stiffen its advocates.

While waiting for the passing of the prohibitory amendment work for prohibition in your state. If no prohibitory measure is before your legislature now try to get one introduced; if you can't do that urge your assemblyman and senator to introduce, as has been done in the New York legislature, a "local option" measure. Then work for that. Or if you have local option in your state, but your community is still wet, get busy with tongue and fingers and feet—walking, writing, talking and singing for temperance.

If you live in territories already dry, get in touch with some neighborhood still wet and tell the prohibition forces there how you won the victory in your county or state.

Remember that what governs legislation in a republic is the expression of public opinion. If you are a voter—or even if you are not—a letter from you to your representatives, either in the state legislature or in Congress, will have weight. And besides the letters you yourself can write, there are the letters you can get others to write.

Then, too, of course, as a league, as a church, as a home, as an individual, don't forget to pray.

A Cry from China

LITTLE HAI IEH TSI (the "Abused Leaf"); a Story of Childhood and its Perils in Heathen China. All who are interested in sweet and innocent childhood will find this a fascinating story. DO YOU KNOW YOUR BIBLE?

DO NOT neglect a single list of the 1915 Bible questions. Start at the year's beginning and work through to the end. Even if you fail once or twice at the beginning of the year, you may catch up and win a prize at the end.

Remember—answers must reach the Christian Herald office within two weeks from the date of the issue in which the questions appear. Address Bible Contest, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

New Questions, List No. 2 Galatians

This epistle is believed to have been written while Paul was on his third missionary journey, probably while at Ephesus (Acts 19: 1-10).

1. What passages in the epistle to the Galatians refer to visits of the apostle to Jerusalem? [The first of the visits is referred to in Acts 9: 26; the second was on the occasion of the great church council, Acts 15.]
2. a. From whom does Paul declare he received his Gospel? b. Did Paul feel that the sanction of the disciples at Jerusalem added anything to his authority as an apostle? c. In what corresponding passage in I Cor. does Paul defend his apostleship?
3. What controversy did Peter and Paul have at Antioch?
4. a. How had the Galatians received the Holy Spirit? b. How were they, then, to be made perfect, by faith or works? [The Judaizers, having failed in the council (Acts 15) to make circumcision and the ceremonial law obligatory upon Gentile Christians, attempted to teach that by later submitting to these requirements they would attain a higher spiritual life and closer fellowship with God.]
5. a. How did Paul claim that even Abraham was justified? b. In what passage in Romans does Paul enlarge upon this statement?
6. a. What is it which Paul declared makes one a child of Abraham, and thus an heir of the promise made to Abraham? b. Find three verses in the third chapter which emphasize the fact that when one becomes a child of Abraham he also becomes an heir of the promise made to Abraham.

7. a. Which came first, the law or the promise? b. How much later did the second come? c. Does the law give life? d. To whom is the fulfillment of the promise given?
8. a. To whom does Paul compare the law? b. Is a Christian a son of God or his bond-slave? c. How were the Galatians indicating their desire to return to bondage?
9. a. What attitude did Paul urge them to take toward the principle of Christian liberty? b. If they consented to trust in outward observances what value would Christ's death for them have? c. What one word fulfils the law?
10. a. How are we kept from yielding to the flesh? b. In what does Paul declare shall be all his confidence, or boasting (or glory)?

We shall have to ask our friends to wait one more week for the Honor Roll of Question List No. 1. So many answers came in on the last day of the contest that it was impossible to complete the Honor Roll in time for this issue.

"Peace on Earth"

"PEACE on earth, good will toward men!" Sang the angels long ago, Over Bethlehem hovering when One in manger lay below.

"Peace on earth" was then his will, "Peace on earth, good will toward men!" So he sees the picture still Even as he saw it then.

When will men in their mad way View it as he viewed it then? When will dawn a brighter day—"Peace on earth, good will toward men"? GEORGE TAGGART.

Paint Without Oil

Remarkable Discovery That Cuts Down the Cost of Paint Seventy-Five Per Cent.

A Free Trial Package is Mailed to everyone Who Writes

A. L. Rice, a prominent manufacturer of Adams, N. Y., has discovered a process of making a new kind of paint without the use of oil. He calls it Powderpaint. It comes in the form of a dry powder and all that is needed is cold water to make a paint weather proof, fire proof and as durable as oil paint. It adheres to any surface, wood, stone or brick, and looks like oil paint and costs about one-fifth as much.

Write to Mr. A. L. Rice, Manufacturer, 8 Fort St., Adams, N. Y., and he will send you a free trial package, also color card and full information showing you how you can save a good many dollars. Write today.

THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

"DEAR me, child," ejaculated Mrs. Chilton, "how you do run on! I should think you were a dozen years old instead of a woman grown. Now, what are you talking about?"

"About a boarding place for Mrs. Carew and Jamie. I've found it," blubbed Pollyanna.

"Indeed! Well, what of it? Of what possible interest can that be to an old?" murmured Mrs. Chilton, "earr."

"Because it's here. I'm going to have them here, auntie."

"Pollyanna!" Mrs. Chilton was sitting erect in horror.

"No, auntie, please don't say no—please don't," begged Pollyanna, "ger." "Don't you see? This is my chance! The chance I've been waiting for; and it's just dropped into my hands. We can do it lovely. We have plenty of room, and you know I can look after the house. And now there'd be money in it, for they'd pay well, I know, and they'd love to come, I'm sure. There'd be three of them—here a secretary with them."

"But, Pollyanna, I can't! Turn this house into a boarding house?—the arrington homestead a common boarding house? Oh, Pollyanna, I can't!"

"But it wouldn't be a common boarding house, dear. 'Twill be an uncommon one. Besides, they're our friends. It would be like having our friends come to see us; only they'd be paying guests, so meanwhile we'd be earning money—money that we need, until money that we need," she emphasized significantly.

"But how could you do it?" she asked at last, faintly. "You couldn't do that work part alone, child!"

"Oh, no, of course not," chirped Pollyanna. (Pollyanna was on sure ground now. She knew her point was won. "But I could do the cooking and the overseeing, and I'm sure I could get one of Nancy's younger sisters to help about the rest. Mrs. Duran would do the laundry part just as she does now.")

"It, Pollyanna, I'm not well at all—yet I know I'm not. I couldn't do that."

"Of course not. There's no reason why you should," scorned Pollyanna offhandedly. "Oh, auntie, won't it be splendid? Why, it seems too good to be true—money just dropped into my hands like that!"

"Dropped into your hands, indeed! You'll have some things to learn in this world, Pollyanna, and one is that summer boarders don't drop money into anybody's hands without looking very sharply to it that they get ample return. By the time you fetch and carry and bake and brew until you are ready to sink, and by the time you nearly kill yourself trying to serve everything to order from fresh-laid eggs to the weather, you will believe what I tell you."

"Oh right, I'll remember," laughed Pollyanna. "But I'm not doing any worrying now; and I'm going to hurry and write Miss Wetherby at once so I can give it to Jimmy Bean to mail when he comes out this afternoon."

Mrs. Chilton stirred restlessly.

"Pollyanna, I do wish you'd call that young man by his proper name. That 'Ben' gives me the shivers. His name is 'Pendleton' now, as I understand it."

"Oh it is," agreed Pollyanna, "but I do forget it half of the time. I even call him that to his face, sometimes, and of course that's dreadful, when he really is adopted, and all. But you see, I'm so excited," she finished, as she dashed from the room.

She had the letter all ready for Jimmy when he called at four o'clock. She was still quivering with excitement, and she lost no time in telling her visitor what it was all about.

"And I'm crazy to see them, besides," she cried, when she had told him of her plans. "I've never seen either of them since that winter. You know I told you—didn't I tell you?—about Jamie?"

"Oh, yes, you told me." There was a touch of restraint in the young man's voice.

"Well, isn't it splendid, if they can come?"

"Why, I don't know as I should call it exactly splendid," he parried.

"Not splendid that I've got such a chance to help Aunt Polly out, for even this little while? Why, Jimmy, of course it's splendid."

"Well, it strikes me that it's going to be rather hard—for you," bridled Jimmy, with more than a shade of irritation.

"Yes, of course, in some ways. But I shall be so glad for the money coming in that I'll think of that all the time. You see," she sighed, "how mercenary I am, Jimmy."

For a long minute there was no reply; then, a little abruptly, the young man asked:

"Let's see, how old is this Jamie now?"

Pollyanna glanced up with a merry smile.

"Oh, I remember—you never did like his name, 'Jamie,'" she twinkled. "Never mind; he's adopted now, legally, I believe, and has taken the name of Carew. So you can call him that."

"But that isn't telling me how old he is," reminded Jimmy, stiffly.

"Nobody knows, exactly, I suppose. You know he couldn't tell; but I imagine he's about your age. I wonder how he is now. I've asked all about it in this letter, anyway."

"Oh, you have!" Pendleton looked down at the letter in his hand and flipped it a little spitefully. He was thinking that he would like to drop it, to tear it up, to give it to somebody, to throw it away, to do anything with it—but mail it.

Jimmy knew perfectly well that he was jealous, that he had always been jealous of this youth with the name so like and yet so unlike his own. Not that he was in love with Pollyanna, he assured himself wrathfully. He was not that, of course. It was just that he did not care to have this strange youth with the sissy name come to Beldingsville and be always around to spoil all their good times. He almost said as much to Pollyanna, but something stayed the words on his lips; and after a time he took his leave, carrying the letter with him.

That Jimmy did not drop the letter, tear it up, give it to anybody, or throw it away was evidenced a few days later, for Pollyanna received a prompt and delighted reply from Miss Wetherby; and when Jimmy came next time he heard it read—or rather he heard part of it, for Pollyanna prefaced the reading by saying:

"Of course the first part is just where she says how glad they are to come, and all that. I won't read that. But the rest I thought you'd like to hear, because you've heard me talk so much about them. Besides, you'll know them yourself pretty soon, of course. I'm depending a whole lot on you, Jimmy, to help me to make it pleasant for them."

"Oh, are you?"

"Now, don't be sarcastic, just because you don't like Jamie's name," reproved Pollyanna, with mock severity. "You'll like him, I'm sure, when you know him; and you'll love Mrs. Carew."

"Will I, indeed?" retorted Jimmy huffly. "Well, that is a serious prospect. Let us hope, if I do, the lady will be so gracious as to reciprocate."

"Of course," dimpled Pollyanna. "Now, listen, and I'll read to you about her. This letter is from her sister, Della—Miss Wetherby, you know, at the Sanatorium."

"All right. Go ahead!" directed Jimmy, with a somewhat too evident attempt at polite interest. And Pollyanna, still smiling mischievously, began to read:

You ask me to tell you everything about everybody. That is a large commission, but I'll do the best I can. To begin with, I think you'll find my sister quite changed. The new interests that have come into her life during the last six years have done wonders for her. Just now she is a bit thin and tired from overwork, but a good rest will soon remedy that, and you'll see how young and blooming and happy she looks. Please notice I said happy. That won't mean so much to you as it does to me, of course, for you were too young to realize quite how unhappy she was when you first knew her that winter in Boston. Life was such a dreary, hopeless thing to her then; and now it is so full of interest and joy.

First she has Jamie, and when you see them together you won't need to be told what he is to her. To be sure, we are no nearer knowing whether he is the real Jamie or not, but my sister loves him like an own son now, and has legally adopted him, as I presume you know.

Then she has her girls. Do you remember Sadie Dean, the salesgirl? Well, from getting interested in her, and trying to help her to a happier living, my sister has broadened her efforts little by little, until she has scores of girls now who regard her as their own best and particular good angel. She has started a home for Working Girls along new lines. Half a dozen wealthy and influential men and women are associated with her, of course, but she is head and shoulders of the whole thing, and never hesitates to give herself to each and every one of the girls. You can imagine what that means in nerve strain. Her chief support and right-hand man is her secretary, this same Sadie Dean. You'll find her changed, too, yet she is the same old Sadie.

As for Jamie—poor Jamie! The great sorrow of his life is that he knows now he can never walk. For a time we all had hopes. He was here at the Sanatorium under Dr. Ames for a year, and he improved to such an extent that he can now go with crutches. But the poor boy will always be a cripple—so far as his feet are concerned, but never as regards anything else. Someway, after you know Jamie, you seldom think of him as a cripple, his soul is so free. I can't explain it, but you'll know what I mean when you see him; and he has retained, to a marvelous degree, his old boyish enthusiasm and joy of living. There is just one thing—and only one, I believe—that would utterly quench that bright spirit and cast him into utter despair; and that is to find that he is not Jamie Kent, our nephew. So long has he brooded over this, and so ardently has he wished it, that he has come actually to believe that he is the real Jamie; but if he isn't, I hope he will never find it out.

"There, that's all she says about them," announced Pollyanna, folding up the closely-written sheets in her hand. "But isn't that interesting?"

"Indeed it is!" There was a ring of genuineness in Jimmy's voice now. Jimmy was thinking of what his own good legs meant to him. He even, for the moment, was willing that this poor crippled youth should have part of Pollyanna's thoughts and attentions, if he were not so presuming as to claim too much of it! "By George! it is tough for the poor chap, and no mistake."

"Tough! You don't know anything about it, Jimmy Bean," choked Pollyanna; "but I do. I couldn't walk once. I know!"

"Yes, of course, of course," frowned the youth, moving restively in his seat. Jimmy, looking into Pollyanna's sympathetic face and brimming eyes, was suddenly not so sure, after all, that he was willing to have this Jamie come to town—if just to think of him made Pollyanna look like that!

CHAPTER XIX

THE PAYING GUESTS

THE few intervening days before the expected arrival of "those dreadful people," as Aunt Polly termed her niece's paying guests, were busy ones indeed for Pollyanna—but they were happy ones, too, as Pollyanna refused to be weary, discouraged, or dismayed, no matter how puzzling were the daily problems she had to meet.

Upon the appointed day, Pollyanna with Timothy (who owned the Harrington horses now) went to the station to meet the afternoon train. Up to this hour there had been nothing but confidence and joyous anticipation in Pollyanna's heart. But with the whistle of the engine there came to her a veritable panic of doubt, shyness, and dismay. She realized suddenly what she, Pollyanna, almost alone and unaided, was about to do. She remembered Mrs. Carew's wealth, position, and fastidious tastes. She recollected, too, that this would be a new, tall, young-man Jamie, quite unlike the boy she had known.

For one awful moment she thought of getting away—somewhere, anywhere.

"Timothy, I—I feel sick. I'm not well. I—tell 'em—not to come," she faltered, poisoning as if for flight. "Ma'am!" exclaimed the startled Timothy.

One glance into Timothy's amazed face was enough. Pollyanna laughed and threw back her shoulders alertly.

"Nothing. Never mind! I didn't mean it, of course, Timothy. Quick—see! They're almost here," she panted. And Pollyanna hurried forward, quite herself once more.

She knew them at once. Even had there been any doubt in her mind, the crutches in the hands of the tall, brown-eyed young man would have piloted her straight to her goal.

There were a brief few minutes of eager hand-clasps and incoherent exclamations, then, somehow, she found herself in the carriage with Mrs. Carew at her side, and Jamie and Sadie Dean in front. She had a chance, then, for the first time, really to see her friends, and to note the changes the six years had wrought.

In regard to Mrs. Carew, her first feeling was one of surprise. She had forgotten that Mrs. Carew was so lovely. She had forgotten that the eyelashes were so long, that the eyes they shaded were so beautiful. She even caught herself thinking enviously of how exactly that perfect face must tally, figure by figure, with that dread beauty-test table. But more than anything else she rejoiced in the absence of the old fretful lines of gloom and bitterness.

Then she turned to Jamie. Here again she was surprised, and for much the same reason. Jamie, too, had grown handsome. To herself Pollyanna declared that he was really distinguished looking. His dark eyes, rather pale face, and dark, waving hair she thought most attractive. Then she caught a glimpse of the crutches at his side, and a spasm of aching sympathy contracted her throat.

From Jamie Pollyanna turned to Sadie Dean. Sadie, so far as features went, looked much as she had when Pollyanna first saw her in the Public Garden; but Pollyanna did not need a second glance to know that Sadie, so far as hair, dress, temper, speech and disposition were concerned, was a very different Sadie, indeed.

Then Jamie spoke.

"How good you were to let us come," he said to Pollyanna. "Do you know what I thought of when you wrote that we could come?"

"Why, n-no, of course not," stammered Pollyanna. Pollyanna was still seeing the crutches at Jamie's side, and her throat was still tightened from that aching sympathy.

"Well, I thought of the little maid in the Public Garden with her bag of peanuts for Sir Lancelot and Lady Guinevere, and I knew you were just putting us in their places, for if you had a bag of peanuts, and we had none, you wouldn't be happy till you'd shared it with us."

"A bag of peanuts, indeed!" laughed Pollyanna.

"Oh, of course, in this case, your bag of peanuts happened to be airy country rooms, and cow's milk, and real eggs from a real hen's nest," returned Jamie whimsically; "but it amounts to the same thing. And maybe I'd better warn you—you remember how greedy Sir Lancelot was?—well—" He paused meaningly.

Wrinkles

Thousands have successfully used this formula to remove traces of age, illness or worry: 1 oz. of pure dissolved in ½ pt. witch hazel; use as a face wash. The effect is almost magical. Deepest wrinkles, crow's feet, as well as finest lines, completely and quickly vanish. Face becomes firm, smooth, fresh, and you look years younger. No harm to tenderest skin. Get genuine Saxolite (powdered) at any drug store.

"All right, I'll take the risk," replied Pollyanna, thinking how glad she was that Aunt Polly was not going to hear her worst predictions newly fulfilled thus early. "Poor Lancelot! I wonder if anybody is in now, or if he's there at all."

"Well, if he's there, he's fed," interrupted Mrs. Carew, merrily. "This boy still goes down there at least once a week with his pockets full of peanuts and I don't know what else. He can be traced any time by the trail of small grains he leaves behind him; and half the time when I order my cereal for breakfast it isn't forthcoming, because, forsooth, 'Master Lancelot' has fed it to the pigeons, a'ar."

"Yes, but let me tell you," plunged Jamie, enthusiastically. And the next minute Pollyanna found herself staring with all the old fascination at a couple of squirrels in a nutmeg garden. Later she saw what Ella Wetherby had meant in her terror when the house was reached, came as a distinct shock to her to see Jamie pick up his crutches and wince himself out of the carriage with a pained grimace. She knew then that already in ten short minutes he had made her forget that he was lame.

To Pollyanna's great relief that first reading meeting between Aunt Polly and the Carew party passed off much better than she had feared. The women were so frankly delighted with the old house and everything in it that it was an utter impossibility for the mistress and owner of it all to anticipate her stiff attitude of disapproving resignation to their presence. Besides, as was plainly evident before the luncheon had passed, the personal charm and magnetism of Jamie had pierced even Aunt Polly's armor of distrust; and Pollyanna knew that at least one of her own most dreaded problems was a problem no longer, for already Aunt Polly was beginning to play the stately yet gracious hostess to these her guests.

Notwithstanding her relief at Aunt Polly's change of attitude, however, Pollyanna did not find that all was smooth sailing, by any means. There was work, and plenty of it, that must be done. Nancy's sister Betty was pleasant and willing, but she was not Nancy, as Pollyanna soon found. She needed training, and training took time. Pollyanna worried, too, for fear everything should not be quite right. To Pollyanna, those days, a dusty chair was a crime and a fallen cake a tragedy.

Gradually, however, after incessant arguments and pleadings on the part of Mrs. Carew and Jamie, Pollyanna came to take her tasks more easily, and to realize that the real crime and tragedy in her friends' eyes was not the dusty chair nor the fallen cake, but the frown of worry and anxiety.

"Just as if it wasn't enough for you to let us come," Jamie declared, "without just killing yourself with work to get us something to eat."

"Besides, we ought not to eat so much, anyway," Mrs. Carew laughed, "or else we shall get 'digestion,' as one of my girls calls it when her food disagrees with her."

It was wonderful, after all, how easily the three new members of the family fitted into the daily life. Before twenty-four hours had passed Mrs. Carew had gotten Mrs. Chilton to asking really interested questions about the new Home for Working Girls, and Sadie Dean and Jamie were quarreling over the chance to help with the pea-shelling or the flower-picking.

THE Imperial Government has examined the communication from the United States Government in the same spirit of good will and friendship by which the communication appears to have been dictated. The Imperial Government is in accord with the United States Government that for both parties it is in a high degree desirable to avoid misunderstandings which might arise from measures announced by the German Admiralty and to provide against the occurrence of incidents which might trouble the friendly relations which so far happily exist between the two governments.

With regard to the assuring of these friendly relations, the German Government believes that it may all the more reckon on a full understanding with the United States, as the procedure announced by the German Admiralty, which was fully explained in the note of the 4th inst., is in no way directed against legitimate commerce and legitimate shipping of neutrals, but represents solely a measure of self-defense, imposed on Germany by her vital interests, against England's method of warfare, which is contrary to international law, and which so far no protest by neutrals has succeeded in bringing back to the generally recognized principles of law as existing before the outbreak of war.

In order to exclude all doubt regarding these cardinal points, the German Government once more begs leave to state how things stand. Until now Germany has scrupulously observed valid international rules regarding naval warfare. At the very beginning of the war Germany immediately agreed to the proposal of the American Government to ratify the new Declaration of London, and took over its contents unaltered, and without formal obligation, into her prize law.

The German Government has obeyed these rules, even when they were diametrically opposed to her military interests. For instance, Germany allowed the transportation of provisions to England from Denmark until today, though she was well able, by her sea forces, to prevent it. In contradistinction to this attitude, England has not even hesitated at a second infringement of international law, if by such means she could paralyze the peaceful commerce of Germany with neutrals. The German Government will be the less obliged to enter into details, as these are put down sufficiently, though not exhaustively, in the American note to the British Government, dated December 29, as a result of five months' experience.

All these encroachments have been made, as has been admitted, in order to cut off all supplies from Germany and thereby starve her peaceful civil population—a procedure contrary to all humanitarian principles. Neutrals have been unable to prevent the interruption of their commerce with Germany, which is contrary to international laws.

The American Government, as Germany readily acknowledges, has protested against the British procedure. In spite of these protests and protests from other neutral states, Great Britain could not be induced to depart from the course of action she had decided upon. Thus, for instance, the American ship Wilhelmina recently was stopped by the British, although her cargo was destined solely for the German civil population, and, according to the express declaration of the German Government, was to be employed only for this purpose.

Germany is as good as cut off from her overseas supply by the silent or protesting toleration of neutrals, not only in regard to such goods as are absolute contraband, but also in regard to such as, according to acknowledged law before the war, are only conditional contraband or not contraband at all. Great Britain, on the other hand, is, with the toleration of neutral governments, not only supplied with such goods as are not contraband or only conditional contraband, but with goods which are regarded by Great Britain, if sent to Germany, as absolute contraband; namely, provisions, industrial raw materials, etc., and even with goods which have always indubitably been regarded as absolute contraband.

The German Government feels itself obliged to point out with the greatest emphasis that a traffic in arms, estimated at many hundreds of millions, is being carried on between American firms and Germany's enemies. Germany fully comprehends that the practice of right and the toleration of wrong on the part of neutrals are matters absolutely at the discretion of neutrals, and involve no formal violation of neutrality. Germany, therefore, did not complain of any formal violation of neutrality, but the German Government, in view of complete evidence before it, cannot help pointing out that it, together with the entire public opinion of Germany, feels itself to be severely prejudiced by the fact that neutrals, in safeguarding their rights in legitimate commerce with Germany, according to international law, have up to the present achieved no, or only insignificant results, while they are making unlimited use of their right by carrying on contraband traffic with Great Britain and our other enemies.

OUR TRADE IN ARMS

If it is a formal right of neutrals to take no steps to protect their legitimate trade with Germany, and even to allow themselves to be influenced in the direction of the conscious and wilful restriction of their trade, on the other hand, they have the perfect right, which they unfortunately do not exercise, to cease contraband trade, especially in arms, with Germany's enemies.

In view of this situation, Germany, after six months of patient waiting, sees herself obliged to answer Great Britain's murderous method of naval warfare with sharp counter-measures. If Great Britain, in her fight against Germany, summons hunger as an ally, for the purpose of imposing upon a civilized people of 70,000,000 the choice between destitution and starvation or submission to Great Britain's commercial will, then Germany today is determined to take up the gauntlet and appeal to similar allies.

Germany trusts that the neutrals, who so far have submitted to the disadvantageous consequences of Great Britain's hunger war in silence, or merely in registering a protest, will display toward Germany no smaller measure of toleration, even if German measures, like those of Great Britain, present new terrors of naval warfare.

Moreover, the German Government is resolved to suppress with all the means at its disposal the importation of war material to Great Britain and her allies, and she takes it for granted that neutral governments, which so far have taken no steps against the traffic in arms with Germany's enemies, will not oppose forcible suppression by Germany of this trade.

Acting from this point of view, the German Admiralty proclaimed a naval war zone, whose limits it exactly defined. Germany, so far as possible, will seek to close this war zone with mines, and will also endeavor to destroy hostile merchant vessels in every other way. While the German Government, in taking action based upon this overpowering point of view, keeps itself far removed from all international destruction of neutral lives and property, on the other hand it does not fail to recognize that from the action to be taken against Great Britain dangers arise which threaten all trade within the war zone, without distinction. This is a natural result of mine warfare, which, even under the strictest observance of the limits of international law, endangers every ship

I am Making a Special Low Factory Price On 10,000 Rapid Fireless Cookers

Be the First in Your Neighborhood to Get This Special Proposition

JUST now I am making a special price on 10,000 Rapid Fireless Cookers to introduce them quickly into new homes. I want you to try a Rapid in your own home a full month at my expense. I don't want you to keep it after you use it a month unless you feel you cannot keep house without it. I have over one hundred and fifty thousand Fireless Cookers now in actual use throughout the country. Every one of them has been sold on the above plan. On that plan you do not take the slightest risk of not being pleased in every detail. Rapid Cookers are the oldest, best known, and most reliable cookers on the market.

I am the original Fireless Cooker man, doing business on a large scale direct from my factories. My plan is low prices, quick sales, and satisfaction guaranteed. My Rapid Fireless Cooker actually reduces the cost of living. It will actually save you a large per cent of your fuel bill, save you work and worry, and will cook all kinds of foods better. It makes them more digestible—brings out their delicious quality. All the flavor of the food remains in the food after it is cooked.

Rapid Fireless Cooker

Aluminum Lined Throughout —Full Equipment of "Wear-Ever" Aluminum Cooking Utensils

Don't you want to make a home test of one of my celebrated Rapid Fireless Cookers? The fastest cooker on the market. Just try one a month at my expense and prove that all I say for my cooker is true. I will take the cooker back gladly at the end of the test and refund all of your money if everything about it is not more than satisfactory.

I want you to use it every day—three times a day if you wish. And while the meals are cooking I want you to go out—see your friends—make some of the calls you've planned for so long—and when you return you will find things cooked better than if you'd stood over a hot stove fretting and worrying.

30 Days' Trial in Your Home

On My Personal Money Back Guarantee

I want you to use the Rapid Fireless Cooker this way for 30 days. Then I want you to take a vote of the entire family and yourself—and if you don't decide that the Rapid Fireless Cooker is a marvel—if the whole family don't say that they never had better meals, more wholesomely cooked, and if you don't say you did it with far less work than you ever did before—then I want you to send it right back at my expense.

Remember you need pay only the wholesale, factory price—the price I can offer you by dealing direct with me. I make you a price so low that the Rapid will soon pay for itself in fuel bills. You'll all say that you wouldn't be without the delicious, savory dishes possible only on the Rapid, even if it cost twice as much. But remember whichever way you decide, the trial costs you not one cent.

MADE IN AMERICA

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

"I'M MAKING my dolly a dress!" the tiny girl announced as she fixed her large eyes on my face. "It's a very pretty dress."

I held up the bit of lace and silk that she had sewed together carefully, though clumsily, with her small fingers.

"Oh!" I said appreciatively, "it's a regular Paris frock, isn't it?"

The child looked at me just a bit reproachfully and when she spoke I gasped with surprise. "No, not a Paris frock!" she answered vehemently; "it's a 'made in America' dress!" She brought out the last in triumph.

"Where," I questioned, "did you learn that?" It was rather amazing to find a mere baby well up in the topic of the day.

"A lady," answered the tiny girl, "came to tea with mother yesterday, and she was talking about it."

I wonder if any of you have ever heard of "The Women's National Made in the U. S. A. League." It is a rather new society with the national headquarters at Washington, and a motto: "Buying everything, whenever possible, 'made in U. S. A.' is practical patriotism."

The Women's National Made in U. S. A. League is non-partisan with no dues, and any woman may join by sending a signed pledge like this one:

"I pledge myself for the welfare of the country, while the war lasts, to demand and buy everything, whenever possible, 'made in U. S. A.,' and urge my friends to do likewise."

Miss Genevieve Champ Clark, daughter of the speaker, is on the committee of workers. Her enthusiasm is shown in an article that she has written on the subject. I am going to quote a bit of the article:

"The other day a friend of mine was on a purchasing tour in some Washington shops. In one shop was a sale of crêpe material. My friend asked the clerk if those materials were made in the U. S. A. In a desultory fashion the clerk responded that she did not know. The manager of the shop, happening by, overheard my friend's remark. He stopped and explained to her that a part of the goods were made in American mills and a part in English. He showed her two samples in the quality of which she could discern no difference. He assured her that there was none. One of the pieces was forty cents a yard. This was American made! The other was seventy-five cents and was made in England. My friend asked him why that was, why he bought English goods when he could buy American made, just as good, at a lower figure. He replied that the women who do the bulk of buying in this country would rather pay the difference on the same goods if they are made in a foreign country. Is this not a lamentable commentary?

"My tailor once told me a story that made me feel like the proverbial 'thirty cents.' He told me that before he came to this country he was a designer for one of the most famous dressmakers in Paris and that his talent had in no way diminished since his removal to this country. That now, however, he had to pay exorbitant prices for models designed by his own pupils, because they remained in Paris and he came to the United States of America. It was resentment over such antics as this which I think prompted the American tailors several years ago to start a great propaganda for American clothes for American women.

They held a great convention, which was attended and enthusiastically endorsed by the leading tailors and modistes of this country. The designs were lovely. But did they succeed? They most certainly did not. We American women would not co-operate.

"All these things are in the past. And as Perlmuter says, 'There's no use crying over spoiled milk, no matter who left the ice-box open.' But we have got some more milk in the ice-box, and let us be careful about the lid. We have the greatest opportunity to solve an economic riddle confronting our country that any generation of American women ever had."

There is a great deal of plain sense in the paragraphs I have quoted. Miss Clark realizes that, while the war in Europe may be tearing homes, and hearts, and nations apart, it is building up, here in America, an independent and a creative spirit that could never have existed while the foreign workman was plying the needle and loom instead of sword and gun. It is the duty—and it should be the pride—of every girl and woman of this nation to help her own countrymen in their new industries—to make the sign, "Made in U. S. A." have a world-wide significance.

MAY BE COFFEE

That Causes all the Trouble

When the house is afire, it's the same as when disease begins—it's no time to talk but time to act—remove the cause of the trouble at once.

"For a number of years," Kansas lady, "I felt sure the coffee was hurting me, and yet I was of it I could not give it up. At last so bad that I made up my mind either quit the use of coffee or die."

"Everything I ate distressed me with palpitation of the heart. I suffered severely most of the time with palpitation of the heart. I frequently woke up in the night with the feeling that I was almost choked. My heart seemed so smothered and its action. My breath grew short and least exertion set me panting, but little and suffered from rheumatism."

"Two years ago I stopped using coffee and began to use Postum. I worked a miracle! Now I eat anything and digest it without trouble. I sleep like a baby, and my heart beats strong and regularly. My rheumatism has become steady and normal, and my rheumatism has left me."

"I feel like another person, and it is all due to quitting coffee and using Postum, for I haven't used any medicine and none would have done any good as long as I kept drugging with coffee. Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms: Regular Postum—must be well boiled 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

Both kinds are equally delicious and cost per cup about the same.

AWAY WITH COURTS!

IT HAS just been proven that courts are not necessary in the settlement of claims over disputed money. At least, there are financial disputes that can be adjusted without litigation by a method which a merchant of New York hit upon recently when threatened with suit for payment for something which he claimed he had never received. The outcome of his method of adjusting the claim shows that both parties in the transaction were honest, even though one must have been mistaken: which one, is immaterial, and even a Solomon might, under the circumstances, be hard put to it to decide.

The facts are best given in the two letters which passed between the parties to the transaction; of course, names are omitted, but the incident occurred between two New York merchants in February of this year. One letter reads as follows:

Bowery Mission, New York:

Find check for $33.88 enclosed with letter attached, which explains itself. Rather than go to law to collect a bill against a man that thinks he is right, I accept his suggestion and forward check enclosed. May it do good.

Yours truly,

The letter addressed to the writer of the above and to which he refers reads:

Referring to your note of January 23, would like to state that I do not think it fair that I should pay for something not received, but to show you that it is not for the sake of the money involved, I will send you a check for the full amount you claim (but not a cent of which I owe), with the understanding that you forward the same to the Bowery Mission to be used for the poor of New York City. Should you not agree with this proposition, you can send back check and start proceedings if you like. If agreeable, send receipted bill.

Respectfully,

The check has been duly put to work through the Bowery Mission, and it is difficult to imagine a finer way to dispose of such a dispute; all that you need do if you are a party in a case of this kind, is to name your favorite charity as the depository for the amount involved and agree with your adversary that payment of the same thereto is a satisfactory settlement.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

PENNSYLVANIA Mother writes: "I wish to acknowledge prayers answered for my son who had mental trouble and is entirely recovered." Another Pennsylvania Mother writes: "I want to tell you that the boy you prayed for some months since (prayed he should be freed from the curse of drink) very obediently signed a pledge. I have verily doubted for a moment that this is a direct answer to prayer." A friend in Illinois writes: "I wish to acknowledge answered prayer for a mother who has given up drinking and trying again to be a man." M. A. K. writes: "A few months ago I asked prayer for the conversion of a young man, also from healing from nerve trouble. God has answered both these prayers, for which I thank him." S. C. writes acknowledging answer to prayer for a young man from a dear one far away. C. E. S. writes from Berlin, Mass.: "Some time ago I wrote asking prayer for healing. I thank God for answer and answering all prayers, for am feeling well and happy." B. writes from Memphis, Tenn.: "I wish to send a note of praise that the prohibition law is being enforced in Memphis."

Another writes from Arkansas: "The Lord has answered my prayer for my son who has been estranged from the family for several years. I received a beautiful letter from him, asking for forgiveness. I also thank the Lord for a daughter's healing." M. E. D., writes from Chester, S. C., to acknowledge answer to prayer for mother's affliction: "I want to tell you that while praying for my mother's recovery I realized how loving God is. Before I had always believed in God, but something very far off, but it came when that God is so real and so near."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from: Mr. J. G., Albion, Iowa; Mrs. T. Ashley, Ohio; A Reader, Iowa; Mrs. S. W. C., Unadilla, N. Y.; Mrs. C. C. M., Buffalo, N. Y.; M. Lakeside, Calif.; J. F. W., Harborside, E. P., Cuckoo, Va.; Mrs. E. J. California; Mrs. A. M. Fordyce, Kansas; Mrs. L. D., San Francisco, Calif. (for restoration of husband's health); R. M. B., La Grange, Ky.; Mrs. K., Ilion, N. Y.; Mrs. I. T. C., Pennsylvania (for financial aid and recovery for her son); C. P., Athens, Ohio; Mrs. F. G. B., Waterport, N. Y.; Mrs. J. H., Galesburg, Ill.; Sister K. Dallas, Texas; W. M. K., Dorchester, N. B.; H. S., Great Falls, Ont.; M. D., Tuscola, Ill.

Mrs. J. R. M., Wales, Ont.; A Reader, Fort Worth, Texas; L. T., Bellair, Ohio; A Reader, New York; F. W. M. (for successful opening of a mission in New York City); Mrs. G. W. C., Mich.; E. E. B., Valparaiso, Neb. (for relief of a great spiritual blessing); S. F. S., Alaska, S. D.; Mrs. E. B., Richland, Ore.; Mrs. M., Tulare, Calif.; Mrs. H. L. C., St. Louis, Mo.; Mrs. I. R., Dade City, Fla.; Mrs. D. J. L., Pocahontas, Tenn.

A Hebrew Christian, whose five-year-old son died a few weeks ago, asks prayer for his wife and two sons who are sick and in the hospital. M. S. asks special prayer that a suit in his valuable property may be graciously settled.

A broken-hearted wife writes: "My mind is all broken up; my husband runs against me. I am a physical wreck; my mind is completely bewildered and I am frantic and troubled with doubts. Please pray that God will give me back my power of right thinking that I may be able to plan for my children's welfare. Also that he will show me how to get out of this terrible trouble." A lady writes from New York: "I am a great sufferer and have been in bed with severe rheumatism eleven years ago. But bodily and physical suffering are not to be counted, but lately a cloud has come and I am in deep grief. I long for peace and the assurance of forgiveness."

Prayers are requested for revivals of religion in Bogor, Mich., in the Church of the Brethren there; Malden, Mass. (in the Maplewood Baptist Church); a church at Gibraltar, Mich.; Colton, Calif.; a church in Illinois; a church at Gurley, La., blessing upon the ministers of the community, and that Evangelist Sunday may come to New Orleans; in the societies of a church at St. Paul, Minn.; Roy, Wash.; Seabrook, N. H. (in Baptist church and community); Long Beach, Calif.; Rough and Ready, Calif.; Lytton, Iowa; upon revival meetings being held at Gettysburg, Pa.; Woodsville, N. H.; Richland, Ore.; Columbiaville, Mich.; Corvallis, Ore.; Tulare, Calif.; Concord, Ill.; Bellaire, Ohio (for outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon people and pastor); for outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the tabernacle at Delhi, N. Y.; at a mission in New York City, and that a Hebrew family may be saved; upon a Bible class recently organized at Coal Dale, Pa. (that its members may receive the Holy Spirit and that wonderful awakening may result from its work); upon a Sunday school class at Jackson, Minn. (that its members may all be active Christians, willing to work for Christ); that dancing and other worldly amusements may be removed from the public schools of Memphis, Tenn.; for world-wide prohibition and suppression of gambling, and for a world-wide revival.

Twelve friends request prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for themselves or friends, including one that the minds of two daughters may be restored.

M. E. S., Mrs. E. A. R., M. E. F., and A Reader ask prayer that their sight may be restored; C. D. and F. F., that mother's sight may be restored; Mrs. J. H., her brother's; R. E. D., two friends; M. N., that one threatened with blindness may receive help; Mrs. H. G. J., that son's eye may be healed without an operation; S. H., that sight may be strengthened; C. N. T., that sight of one eye may be restored.

Sixteen other friends ask prayer for restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves or friends.

Thirty-seven friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Fifteen friends ask prayer that relatives or friends may be delivered from the drink habit. A wife asks prayer that her husband may be delivered from the drug habit; a friend that a cousin may be cured of the drug habit; another friend to be cured of the morphine habit.

Twenty-eight parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons.

Fifteen wives ask prayer for the conversion of their husbands, including one that husband may return to God and to his family.

Forty-four friends ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives and friends.

Thirteen readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

Forty-nine friends ask prayer for the healing of themselves; eighty-two for the healing of other relatives and friends, including one that a pastor's wife may be restored to health and strength, another for the healing of son who has never talked.

Seventeen friends ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or other friends.

Forty-one friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Sixty-two friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including one for the return and reconciliation of husband; another for the return of wife and baby; another that the truth may be known concerning a wrong for which he is blamed and of which he is not guilty, and that he may be restored in the estimation of all who know him; another that husband may return; another friend requests prayer for a son's return to his parents; another that a son out West may write home; also another that a son may return to his wife and little ones.

M. S. C. appreciates the kindness of friends who have written her and will answer their letters as soon as she can. One friend with faith has appointed eight o'clock in the evening—Denver time—for united prayer for her friend's healing.

Some friends write anonymously to whom letters of personal counsel would be sent if their letters were accompanied by name and address.

Where sore throats come from—

SCARCELY a day passes but that you find yourself in the very places where sore throats come from—in the crowded places, the stuffy cars, stores, theatres, where with every breath you must inhale millions of germs, and germs not only of sore throat, but often of more serious maladies.

The mouth and throat are the camping ground of these invaders, and although nature herself repels them frequently, they may gain the upper hand if one's health is even a trifle below par—and hence the wisdom, nay duty—of taking Formamint, the throat protector.

A little tablet, handy to use, with a pleasing and refreshing taste, Formamint disinfects the mouth and throat—thoroughly—as no gargle ever can. The germicide it sets free in the saliva, while harmless to the tenderest membranes, reaches and destroys the germs in even the remotest crevices of the mouth, tonsils, and throat—and so helps nature restore the inflamed tissues to health.

Over 10,000 doctors have endorsed Formamint both as a means of checking sore throats and of preventing the entrance of infectious disease. And you will find the little tablet a handy and trustworthy safeguard of your own health. At all druggists.

Dr. Wm. Lee Howard, the well-known medical author writes: "I have no hesitation in stating that in Formamint we have a remedy that is invaluable in keeping the mouth and air passages free from germ infection."

Jack London writes: "I am tremendously pleased with the antiseptic qualities of your Formamint Tablets. Formamint is a real cleanser of mouth germs."

GERMANY'S REPLY TO OUR NOTE

approaching the mine area. The German Government considers itself entitled to hope that all neutrals will acquiesce in these measures, as they have done in the case of the grievous damages inflicted upon them by British measures, all the more so as Germany is resolved, for the protection of neutral shipping, even in the naval war zone, to do everything which is at all compatible with the attainment of this object.

WARNS NEUTRALS AWAY

In view of the fact that Germany gave the first proof of her good will in fixing a time limit of not less than fourteen days before the execution of said measures, so that neutral shipping might have an opportunity of making arrangements to avoid threatening danger, this can most surely be achieved by remaining away from the naval war zone. Neutral vessels which, despite this ample notice, which greatly affects the achievement of our aims in our war against Great Britain, enter these closed waters will themselves bear the responsibility for any unfortunate accidents that may occur. Germany disclaims all responsibility for such accidents and their consequences.

Germany has further expressly announced the destruction of all enemy merchant vessels found within the war zone, but not the destruction of all merchant vessels, as the United States seems erroneously to have understood. This restriction which Germany imposes upon itself is prejudicial to the aim of our warfare, especially as in the application of the conception of contraband practiced by Great Britain toward Germany—which conception will now also be similarly interpreted by Germany—the presumption will be that neutral ships have contraband aboard. Germany naturally is unwilling to renounce its rights to ascertain the presence of contraband in neutral vessels, and in certain cases to draw conclusions therefrom.

Germany is ready, finally, to deliberate with the United States concerning any measures which might secure the safety of legitimate shipping of neutrals in the war zone. Germany cannot, however, forbear to point out that all its efforts in this direction may be rendered very difficult by two circumstances: First, the misuse of neutral flags by British merchant vessels, which is indubitably known to the United States; second, the contraband trade already mentioned, especially in war materials, on neutral vessels.

Regarding the latter point, Germany would fain hope that the United States, after further consideration, will come to a conclusion corresponding to the spirit of real neutrality. Regarding the first point, the secret order of the British Admiralty, recommending to British merchant ships the use of neutral flags, has been communicated by Germany to the United States and confirmed by communication with the British Foreign Office, which designates this procedure as entirely unobjectionable and in accordance with British law. British merchant shipping immediately followed this advice, as doubtless is known to the American Government from the incidents of the Lusitania and the Laetia.

ARMING MERCHANT SHIPS

Moreover, the British Government has supplied arms to British merchant ships and instructed them forcibly to resist German submarines. In these circumstances it would be very difficult for submarines to recognize neutral merchant ships, for search in most cases cannot be undertaken, seeing in the case of a disguised British ship, from which an attack may be expected, the searching party and the submarine would be exposed to destruction.

Great Britain, then, was in a position to make the German measures illusory if the British merchant fleet persisted in the misuse of neutral flags, and neutral ships could not otherwise be recognized beyond doubt. Germany, however, being in a state of necessity, wherein she was placed by violation of law, must render effective her measures in all circumstances, in order thereby to compel her adversary to adopt methods of warfare corresponding with international law, and so to restore the freedom of the seas, of which Germany at all times is the defender and for which she today is fighting.

Germany, therefore, rejoices that the United States has made representations to Great Britain concerning the illegal use of their flag, and expresses the expectation that this procedure will force Great Britain to respect the American flag in the future. In this expectation, commanders of German submarines have been instructed, as already mentioned in the note of February 4, to refrain from violent action against American merchant vessels, so far as these can be recognized.

SUGGESTS CONVOYS

In order to prevent in the surest manner the consequence of confusion—though naturally not so far as mines are concerned—Germany recommends that the United States make its ships which are conveying peaceful cargoes through the British war zone discernible by means of convoys.

Germany believes it may act on the supposition that only such ships would be convoyed as carried goods not regarded as contraband according to the British interpretation made in the case of Germany.

How this method of convoy can be carried out is a question concerning which Germany is ready to open negotiations with the United States as soon as possible. Germany would be particularly grateful, however, if the United States would urgently recommend to its merchant vessels to avoid the British naval war zone, in any case until the settlement of the flag question. Germany is inclined to the confident hope that the United States will be able to appreciate in its entire significance the heavy battle which Germany is waging for existence, and that from the foregoing explanations and promises it will acquire full understanding of the motives and the aims of the measures announced by Germany.

Germany repeats that it has now resolved upon the projected measures only under the strongest necessity of national self-defense, such measures having been deferred out of consideration for neutrals.

If the United States, in view of the weight which it is justified in throwing and able to throw into the scales of the fate of peoples, should succeed at the last moment in removing the grounds which make that procedure an obligatory duty for Germany, and if the American Government, in particular, should find a way to make the Declaration of London respected—on behalf also of those powers which are fighting on Germany's side—and thereby make possible for Germany legitimate importation of the necessities of life and industrial raw material, then the German Government could not too highly appreciate such a service, rendered in the interests of humane methods of warfare, and would gladly draw conclusions from the new situation.

In West Virginia after four months' trial of prohibition, Wheeling has turned her brewery into a packing house which employs three times as many men, and every place which once was a saloon has been rented to another form of industry, some at advanced rents. Charleston's brewery has become an ice plant, and the people are to have ice at a price that the poor of the city can afford. And for the first time in the history of the State a grand jury has adjourned without finding a single offense worthy of indictment.

The Car that Laughs at Hills

The Maxwell is the car in which "Wild Bill" Turner made the world-record climb up Mt. Hamilton to the famous Mt. Lick Observatory.

The Maxwell is the car that Billy Carlson drove 9 miles up Mt. Wilson, Cal., over snow and ice, around sharp dangerous curves, climbing 6,000 feet in 29 minutes and 1 second, breaking the previous record of 42 minutes. These are but two of the Maxwell stock car hill climbing records.

Every man that owns a Maxwell is able to laugh at hills.

The "1915" Maxwell has 17 new features, and it is a beautiful car—a powerful car—an easy riding car—and a car that is fully equipped. Its light weight makes it very economical to operate.

The "1915" Maxwell is one of the easiest cars to drive. It has an adjustable front seat which may be moved three or four inches backward to suit the driver's leg length.

If you want a car of ample power to climb hills with speed and pull through heavy going, this is the car.

It's simply a matter of insurance, that's all. Insurance of the quality that a man EXPECTS in any car that carries that name of Studebaker.

Studebaker is not satisfied merely to assemble motors and axles and parts bought from parts-manufacturers, but in order to get the accuracy of fit and the balance and the harmony of operation that a car MUST have to meet Studebaker requirements, Studebaker manufactures practically all of its own parts.

And so, "—because it's a Studebaker"—because this car carries a name that for 63 years has stood for the highest ideals in manufacturing—a name that has come to be a pledge of QUALITY in every detail—Studebaker MAKES SURE by manufacturing Studebaker cars COMPLETE in Studebaker plants.

Motors, gears, axles, transmissions, bodies, tops, fenders—ALL the hundreds of parts, in fact, that go to make up a car, with the exception of the tires, the horn, the electric system and such specialized equipment as is manufactured to Studebaker specifications—are designed and manufactured in Studebaker plants.

To Studebaker, this policy of COMPLETE manufacturing means the certainty that every Studebaker car lives up to the promise of its name. And to the buyer, it means a car that carries only ONE profit—because there are no parts-makers' profits in the price—and a car that can be depended upon to give SERVICE and FULL money's worth of satisfaction for every dollar of the price

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

THE interesting events from a popular standpoint of the week last past have been the attack on the Dardanelles, the Polish campaign of Marshal von Hindenburg and the submarine attack on British commerce. The possibility of a successful campaign against Constantinople, however, deserves some notice as well as the military.

Premier Goremykin of Russia in a speech before the Duma just prior to its hasty adjournment, the text of which has just now reached us, let the cat out of the bag when he said that Russia's great reward for participation in this war would be the possession of Constantinople. Had he sought a declaration which would be most effectual in chilling pro-Russian or pro-ally feeling in Rumania, Bulgaria, Greece or even Serbia itself, he could not have found one which would have better served the purpose.

The people of these little Balkan states have a keen sense of nationality, and neither they nor their statesmen fail to recognize that Russia to north, east and south of them would ultimately mean their becoming provinces of that empire. Unquestionably, however, this matter has been arranged among the three important allies, for when, late in the week, this matter was brought up in the House of Commons on a question by one of the members as to whether "England knew and approved of the Russian statement," the reply of Sir Edward was that "with these aspirations England is in sympathy. When their realization will take no doubt will be settled in the terms of peace."

The military part of this campaign has resulted so far in the success of the Allies. Late in the week (February 26) London announced that the outer forts at the entrance of the Dardanelles had been engaged by an Allied fleet numbering between thirty and forty warships, and had been successfully reduced. How strong these forts were is a little of a puzzle. In recent years they had been permitted to go into decay, but whether or not they had been strengthened since the outbreak of the war we do not know. There were two of these forts on the European side, Helles Burme and Sedd-el-Bahr, and one on the Asiatic, Kum Kale. The latest cables assert that the attack is continuing on the inner line of forts. It will be rather surprising if the Dardanelles are speedily forced. These straits are forty-seven miles in length, and vary from one mile to four and one-half miles in width. At the narrowest point, where there is also an island in the middle of the strait, are situated the strongest fortifications, and at many other points there are forts and defenses, particularly at the entrance to the Sea of Marmora; besides which permanent fortifications, the entire length of the straits has been heavily mined, and on the defenses thus created we are given to understand the most reliance is placed by the defenders.

In the event that the Dardanelles are forced, the sea of Marmora still remains to be traversed before Constantinople can be bombarded. This sea is full of islands to which troops and artillery have recently been sent, and mines and submarines will also be used in its defense. There are some intimations that the attackers will land troops to aid in the attack, which they readily could do from fairly nearby points such as Malta and Egypt, if the military situation at such points permit. However, this contingency may at the moment be a little premature for discussion, as certainly troops will not be landed until the straits are more nearly forced. There is also talk of an attack from the north by the Russians, but this seems a little doubtful as a possibility.

The opening of the Dardanelles to Russia would somewhat simplify both the Allies' finances and the question of their food supply, as it would enable Russia to market an immense stock of surplus wheat which she has been unable to get forward heretofore. This would have the collateral effect of reducing the price of wheat in America.

Outside of the Dardanelles episode, the Russo-Turkish campaign has been rather quiet during the week, though the Turks have defeated the Russians near Batum, and are advancing towards that center of Russia's oil supply. Persia has dismissed her pro-Russian officials largely and seems to have determined to cast her lot in with the Turks.

No change has occurred during the week as to the Italian position of scrupulous neutrality. As regards Rumania, the Russian minister at Bucharest informed his government in the early part of the week that Russia could not count on Rumanian co-operation. This official announcement, however, did not stop the usual crop of rumors on the subject, the latest announcing her active participation in the war on the side of the Allies, early in April.

Marshal von Hindenburg's East Prussian victory has grown to be in point of size perhaps the greatest of the war so far, and by common consent will, it seems, be known as the Battle of the Masurian Lakes. A late report from an American, the representative of the most important American news-gathering agency, who was present at the battle in East Prussia, has just reached us and gives a very vivid description of the fight and the subsequent retreat of the Russians.

According to his account, von Hindenburg, while concentrating the attention of the Russians on the Warsaw line, quietly assembled an overwhelming force in East Prussia behind the Masurian lakes, and then suddenly launched an attack on the unsuspecting Russian commander, General Baron Sievers, in three simultaneous assaults.

The frontal attack was made by the troops against whom the Russians had been operating for some time, and while they were busied repelling this, two other armies, one from the north and one from the south, fell upon them, and the Russian army was cut to pieces. The battle was fought in a driving snowstorm, and the correspondent ascribes the escape of any part of the Russian army to the fact that this snowstorm was driving from the north and into the eyes of the German forces coming from the south.

The retreat is described as being in the nature of a rout. The correspondent motoring along its line over roads deep in snow and through a desolate and swampy country reports a scene of defeat and demoralization which scarcely can be conveyed in words. Abandoned guns and automobiles, wrecked and overturned wagons, sledges and ammunition caissons encumbered the way. Rifles, blankets, knapsacks and other equipment lay in thousands where thrown by the fleeing soldiers. Dead horses and an occasional fallen soldier were everywhere along the roadside.

At street corners in the towns of Suwalki and Augustowo were great heaps of abandoned rifles and bayonets, while large bands of Russian prisoners, many of whom surrendered without firing a shot, were frequently encountered along the road. Late despatches state that the number of pieces of artillery lost by the Russians in this fight and retreat will exceed 300.

Among the hundred thousand prisoners are one army commander, General Burgaloff, seven major and brigadier generals and about 3,500 other officers, besides immense quantities of munitions of war, horses, etc.

Since the battle the Germans have vigorously pursued the retreating foe, who has been compelled to fall back to and in some cases farther than the line of first defense fortresses extending from Kowno, south through Ossowetz and Ostrolenka to Novo Georgievsk. Suwalki and Augustowo, towns on this line, have been captured and the German troops have at this point advanced much farther to the east, in fact to within a few miles of Grodno. The movement eastward of the Germans in Poland north of the Vistula has continued all through the week in two columns. The first, advancing southeastward from Lyck in East Prussia, at the end of the week had reached and taken by storm the town of Przasnysz, capturing some ten thousand prisoners of war and considerable artillery. The evident objective of this column is a position in the rear of the fortress of Novo Georgievsk, in order to attack this fortress, operating simultaneously with the column next mentioned.

This column, which, advancing north of the Vistula, had last week reached Plock, is now located at Wyszgrod, within striking distance of Novo Georgievsk. There will probably be a considerable wait here until the first column reaches its position, and also until the heavy artillery, now in process of being brought out, reaches it, a slow process over abominable Polish roads. In central Poland, the only change to be noted during the week has been the re-occupation of Morligh southeast of Borliou by the Russians. Elsewhere there have been some skirmishes and some cannonading, but no changes in position.

Coming south into Galicia, there has been hard fighting with slight Austrian gains on the lower San River, severe fighting with indecisive results on the northern slope of the Carpathians as far as the Jabonlitza Pass. Through the latter pass the Austrians made an advance last week in force and penetrated a considerable distance northward. This advance continued this week, and the Russians were severely defeated near the important railway junction town of Stanislaw, this town falling into the possession of the Austrians.

Very late in this week the Austrians made another advance northward, and a pitched battle is going on as these lines are written on the banks of the Dniester opposite Halicz, another junction town, and sixty-nine miles from Lemberg.

Bukowina is now completely cleared of the Russians. After their retreat from Czernowitz, mentioned last week, the retreating troops received reinforcements and re-advanced, but were decisively beaten at Bojan, and have since again retreated from Bukowina.

Some minor fighting between the Montenegrins and Servians took place during the week, but was resultless, except that near Antivari, on the Montenegrin coast, the Austrians sank a French torpedo boat, the Dague, which was aiding the Montenegrins.

The mutiny among the Indian troops which took place at Singapore during the week and cost the lives of some 600, including seven British officers, is directly from this cause. These vessels were, small and their loss in view of the number of British ships will not be noticed, but undoubtedly some uneasiness has been created among sailors, but so far the movement of shipping has been but little affected.

Several neutral vessels were sunk, primarily Norwegian, and several other British and Norwegian vessels were lost through mines. The loss of these vessels has been very small, all things considered. The German submarines have shown great boldness in their attacks, even going into British harbors.

The official information of London, late in the week, set out the following statement, which so thoroughly summarizes the situation in a few words that it is both as to the movement of the armies in the western battle field and the importance of such movements, that it is quoted verbatim. It runs:

"Since the repulse of the Germans by the allied forces in Flanders, no battle of great importance has been fought. The gain in the smaller engagements which have taken place is measured by the amount of ground won, the results are indeed small. A few hundred yards to the north of Arras, a village or two between Arras and the corner of the line nearest Paris, a belt varying in a mile and a half to two hundred yards wide to the east of Arras, and a few miles of what was German territory in Alsace—these acres are all that have been gained. The enemy holds on Belgium and northern France is as strong as ever."

During the week the situation on this western line was absolutely calm, from the sea to Alsace. There was some titling and inconsequential fighting north of Perthes in the Champagne and in Alsace, both sides claiming small gains. Firms were fitfully bombarded once or twice, otherwise there is nothing worth chronicling.

Great Britain is reported to be sending nearly a hundred thousand men to this front each week. While the number is perhaps exaggerated, there is little doubt that she is sending forward troops in large numbers; probably, however, there will be no serious fighting on this line until the weather settles.

[Washington has sent two new notes to the English and German Governments on the naval war zone situation. These notes and their discussions abroad are treated in profound secrecy at present. The President is reported as having received favorable notes from Ambassadors Page and Gerard.—Editor.]

Heavy lines show frontiers. Parallel lines, dotted, show approximate battle line in February. Underlined towns are fortified. Cross-ruled lines indicate railroads: A and B, to Berlin; C, to Berlin and Budapest; D, to Vienna; E and F, to Budapest; G, to Black Sea port; I and J, to southern Russia; K and L, to Moscow; M, to Petrograd; N and O, to Russian interior and to Koenigsberg; P, terminal.

probably an isolated event arising from local causes. These soldiers were not Mohammedans, and hence the Holy War, which, by the way, appears so far to be a fizzle, was not the moving cause.

The Canadian regiment, the Princess Patricia, has up to the present time lost about 150 men; only one other Canadian regiment has been in action.

The submarine campaign, while spectacular, has on the whole not been remarkably productive of results, either psychological or material. During the week Great Britain lost some eight or nine vessels

THE RELIGIOUS TRAGEDY IN TEXAS

AN ACCOUNT BY A SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT OF THE ASSASSINATION OF WILLIAM BLACK

ONE of the greatest tragedies ever known in Harrison County, Texas, was perpetrated by men engaged in the service of Christianity and was the result of religious prejudices. The tragedy occurred in a private room in a hotel at Marshall, about 6 o'clock Wednesday evening, February 3. Two men were killed outright and a third received wounds from which he died later. Those who lost their lives in the shooting were William Black, ex-priest and traveling lecturer; George Rogers, contractor, of Marshall, who died almost instantly, and John Copeland, cashier of the First State Bank of Marshall, who lingered several days after the shooting.

Tuesday night preceding the killing, William Black, who registered from Bellaire, Ohio, delivered a lecture in the court house before a large audience on "Effects of the Confessional Box." The lecturer claimed that he was an ex-priest, and made strong statements against the Roman Catholic Church. His talk at times was vitriolic in its nature, and aroused much indignation among members of the Catholic Church who heard the vigorous denunciation. Among those present at the lecture Tuesday night were John Rogers and John Copeland, George Ryan and George Tier, who were open in their denunciation of the attack on the Catholic Church.

Wednesday morning, the town of Marshall was in a furore of excitement. Many prominent and wealthy citizens championed the cause of the visiting lecturer, and he was warmly congratulated when seen on the street. On the other hand, friends of the Catholic Church openly condemned the action of lecturer Black and branded him as a "fake" in their public utterances.

Throughout the morning, William Black, with his friend C. F. Hall, who registered from St. Paul, Minn., and his adopted daughter, Miss Sadie Black, remained in their rooms at the hotel. In the afternoon, an advertisement was given out announcing that William Black would deliver another attack on the Catholic Church at the court house that night, exposing the inner workings of that faith, from the angle of a man who had once been a priest. The announcement created a sensation, and it was plainly evident from the small groups of men gathered in earnest conversation on various street corners, that trouble was brewing. Gatherings of this nature in Texas towns generally have a sequel, and such sequels are often written in blood.

A few minutes before 5 o'clock in the afternoon, William Black, accompanied by C. F. Hall and his daughter, Miss Sadie Black, left the hotel and went for a walk, passing through the principal streets of the city and into the residence district. At five minutes before 6 o'clock they returned to the hotel, and met in the lobby a committee of members of the Catholic Church, who demanded a private interview with Mr. Black. The committee was composed of George Ryan, John Copeland, George Tier and John Rogers. The men were invited to the room of Mr. Black and the events that followed are best told in the sworn statements of eye-witnesses.

The first witness introduced in the examining trial was Miss Sadie Black, who testified that she had recently been an inmate of the Home of the Good Shepherd in Hot Springs, Ark.; that she was only the adopted daughter of William Black, whom she met after running away from the Home of the Good Shepherd. She testified that, after running away from the institution, she went to her own home at Little Rock, and there met William Black, who legally adopted her, and that she had only been traveling with him a week when the tragedy occurred. The adoption papers were found in the coat pocket of William Black, pierced by a bullet. She testified that when the men entered the room, John Rogers said to her father: "We understand that you are lecturing here against Romanism, and had we have known that you were going to deliver such a lecture last night, we would have stopped you sooner. You can't deliver the lecture tonight and you are going to leave town."

"To this my father said that he was going to deliver the lecture as advertised, and that he was not going to leave town."

"With this the man with the big derby, John Rogers, jumped on my father, grabbed him by the arms, and a vicious scuffle followed. Then the other man shot my father. My father said

A DAY WITH A SKY-PILOT

BY REV. ALEXANDER PRINGLE

88-YEAR-OLD HOMESTEADER

IT WAS twilight on the prairie—not the prairie of flower-scented June with its purple haze of quiet sundown, but the wind-swept prairie of bleak November, wild and wilful in its elemental passions.

There was a steady falling temperature as black night settled down on the desert-like waste of snow and desolation.

The train rolled into the station. There were lights therefore human habitations—grateful to break the oppressive monotony.

"Fire it is, right opposite, the best hotel in town. Certainly, it was warm, and comfortable for the tired traveler a good night's rest. Lunch counter and barroom occupied different corners of the same room. The former was my favorite. The pork and beans were not quite up to the Boston standard, but they tasted good to a hungry man. Business for the day being about over, the cook came out from behind his curtains and dropped into familiar conversation with the waiter.

"See, Bill, what ever become of that 'bo Finerty inched last week?"

"I'm sure I don't know, Jim; the last I heard of him he'd crawled into the jungle to get out of sight of the deputy."

"Believe me, that was some package: the poor devil got from the deputy sheriff. I seen the thing with my own eyes from the saloon window. The day we was sitting on a box when up comes Finerty and attacked him out wid his billy. He lay there for dead and I didn't care if he was only a 'bo, I couldn't see no man die without I done somethin' to save him. So I carried him out a cup of hot coffee. I raised his head; he took a gulp; and—excuse me, partner [with a courtesy to me] when I carried back the cup it was half full of blood. Believe me, it was fierce; and the tramp hadn't done a thing to nobody."

The night wind howled savagely like famished wolves pursuing their prey. It was bitterly cold; but the hotel was warm. I was soon in bed, for my work next day called for an early start.

Sleep was prevented by an angry discussion coming from an adjoining room. At first it seemed like the bitter reproaches of a badly abused boy in heated altercation with a heartless, unjust parent; but as the tones grew louder and angrier, and as the second party made reply, the true situation became apparent: she claimed the right to dance with whom she pleased. At length, without blows or pistol shots—much to my surprise—the uninspiring word-duel ceased, the angry combatants having exhausted their profanity, vituperation, and obscenity.

In the gray morning I made my way through the "jungle" to the Missouri River, which must be crossed by ferry. Down stream, and close to the farther side, I descried a dim figure. It was the ferryman in an open boat battling with the dangerous current. The ice floe almost clogged the river; it seemed a miracle how a rowboat could live in such angry waters. Too eagerly intent on the ferryman's fate, I stepped on what looked like the sandy beach; but underneath was thin ice which let me through, treating me to immersion in true Baptist style. I had scarcely regained my feet when my body was encased in ice.

This, however, was not half so disappointing as the remark of the ferryman on landing: "I wouldn't cross that river again without breakfast and another pair of oars for all Dakota."

"Friend," I ventured, "it is very necessary that I get across, for I am due in Plain City at eleven."

"Sorry, boss. I'm exhausted." He was; and it was daredevil business to attempt to cross the river in an open skiff with such a jam of rapid-flowing ice.

George Ryan testified that Rogers made a demand of Black to leave town, which was refused, and that Rogers then leaned over and shook his finger in Black's face, saying, "You won't lecture here tonight!"

"Black then reached for his gun," said Ryan, "and as he did so, Hall shot Rogers." Ryan testified that other shots were fired, and that Hall backed into a bathroom and continued firing, mortally wounding Copeland.

After the hearing George Ryan was bound over to the grand jury under a bond of $10,000; George Tier, $5,000, and Clarence F. Hall, $2,500.

Dr. Knott, a guest at the hotel, was the first person to enter the room after the shooting. He found Black lying on the floor, shot through the heart, and across his body Rogers was lying, shot through the head. Copeland was lying near the door, shot in the breast near the left shoulder, and in the abdomen.

The $2,500 bond of C. F. Hall was made up by prominent citizens of Marshall, who were in sympathy with him, and who offered him much assistance in the way of procuring counsel. Hall is about thirty-five years of age. He claims to have fired the shots in the protection of his friend and of himself, when attacked by four armed men in his own room. "I knew nothing of those men," said Hall. "I knew they were prominent in the Catholic Church; and when they abused Black for his speech of Tuesday night I said nothing, but when they pulled guns and began shooting, I realized that not only Black but myself were in immediate danger of being killed. I pulled my gun and shot as effectively as I could until all danger to myself was past. When the smoke cleared away I saw my friend Black dead on the floor, and Rogers and Copeland mortally wounded near his body. I have known Black a long time and knew him to be a Christian gentleman. He was a lecturer of considerable ability. I accompanied him as his business manager."

Testimony as to who fired the first shot is conflicting, but it was definitely settled that the killing grew out of intense feeling induced by attacks on the Catholic religion in a lecture delivered by William Black, and resulted immediately after a futile attempt on the part of prominent Catholics and members of the Knights of Columbus to drive William Black from the city. The men charged with the assault on Black are strongly financed, and are receiving outside assistance from an unknown but suspected source. Hall is being cared for by men who believe in fair play, and who are of the opinion that he was unwarrantedly and unlawfully attacked.

Marshall is divided into factions, whose animosities will not subside during the present generation. There are three factions in the town: Those in sympathy with the Catholic Church and personal friends of the deceased Ryan and Copeland; those in sympathy with the anti-Catholic element and prominent members of Protestant churches; and those who are bitterly opposed to men of any religious cult seeking to serve their Lord with six-shooters.

It is openly alleged on the streets of Marshall that the plan to have a committee to visit Mr. Black and discuss matters with him was conceived in the hall of the Knights of Columbus.

A PRETENTIOUS WILDERNESS MANSION

Having already traveled over five hundred miles to make an appointment I did not like to sit down defeated with my destination only twenty miles away. "You can't possibly cross the river," said the hotel man. "Make yourself comfortable where you are."

But I found a railway bridge some miles up stream, so I started out afoot. It wasn't the pleasantest walking, to be sure; but the sun came out, and I soon forgot petty inconveniences in the exhilaration of a real hike over the snow and ice, in the teeth of a prairie blizzard. Fortunately, I was provided with a lumberjack's mackinaw, the ideal garment for a winter's walk.

Fortunately, too, I found a half-way house where I had a few minutes' rest and shelter. The good woman prepared a hasty lunch. Two others—neighbors, evidently—played cards; a third did fancy work.

"We have no church to go to," they apologetically explained. "We must do something."

A baby of one of them played on the floor. Five miles farther on an auto hurried up. "Jump in, you fool! Why do you walk a day like this?"

This rough and ready hospitality was accepted. A passenger sat beside the driver. There was baggage piled on the seat behind covered with a robe. I wedged myself in. The man in front passed a whisky bottle; but I declined after the example of Scott and Peary in their polar experiences!

The keen tooth of that winter wind grew keener as the day wore on; but its breath was not half as rude as man's brutality revealed in the conversation I was compelled to hear, conversation without point or interest, whose chief mark was bestiality.

All of a sudden the thing I was sitting on moved! Could some beast have crawled in here for protection against the cold? Such an unsuspected thing gives a fellow a creepy feeling, but the mystery was quickly solved. It was a drunken man rousing out of his stupor. I made way for the apparition, which soon found its headgear—and its whisky flask, which was duly offered to the his gun out, but was unable to use it, when I ran from the room."

In his testimony, C. F. Hall corroborated the testimony of Miss Black as to the shooting of Black. Then, according to his testimony, "Rogers leapt over him, and I fired at his head striking him just above the right eye. I then sprang back into the bathroom to cut off the fire from the right, where the other two men were standing on the foot of the bed and the other on the other side near the wall. They were making for their hip pockets. I do not remember how many times I fired, but my pistol hung fire one time. The other men ran into the hallway and I followed them. I did not notice down the hallway. The men escaped by way of a stairway in the extreme east end of the building. Other people ran up from the lobby, and I did not fire after leaving the room."

Intense was the feeling at the examining trial of C. F. Hall and Ryan and Tier that the sheriff ordered all men who entered the court house searched for firearms.

THE WORLD'S DAILY BREAD

A SERMON BY REV. VICTOR F. BROWN, D.D.*

"Give us this day our daily bread." Matt. 6: 11. "Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh the harvest?" John 4: 35.

THE texts are a call to forethought, and an honest look into the future. Men and nations alike must be provident and forearmed against the day of necessity and danger.

The improvident man never looks forward. His motto is, "Let us eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow we die." He lives for today. He forgets that there is a tomorrow coming. In a sense we are all of us improvident. We forget that there is a need beyond the needs of today. Because hunger has never pinched us we think it never will. Because these broad acres of our magnificent country have always provided us plenty and to spare we think they always will. Because God has given us harvests for the season, we think that no season can ever come without an abundance. All this may be true, but it is an entirely unsafe principle upon which to base one's life and all his relations to it. In fact it is to be questioned if he would trust his domestic loves to such a slender thread. Such things have happened as the severing of the tie that binds, and cold, gray ashes have been left upon the hearthstone where love once kept her altar fires aglow.

Today we have in mind something far greater than a matter of any single personal improvidence. We are thinking today in the terms of national improvidence. Not that we are wasteful; but we are thinking of the enormous loss of labor from which we are suffering today; of the tremendous loss from which our industries are suffering because of the paralyzed condition of business, of the consequent high prices which all men are forced to pay for their daily bread and for all the other staples of existence. The burden is no less than staggering, it is appalling! It is crushing the very life out of your brothers and mine. It is robbing the hearthstone of its warmth, the larder of its food and the heart of man of its laughter and hope. This is not right. This is not as it should be. This is not as God intended it should be. Jesus Christ had the true secret. It was embodied in that wonderful prayer, "Our Father, who art in heaven. . . . Give us this day our daily bread." He taught us to have that intimate relationship with God, our Father, by which we could touch the secret springs of life and prosperity.

Jesus never intended that any man should place the narrow limitation of twenty-four hours upon that prayer. Instead of being a prayer for just twenty-four hours, it is a prayer that reaches up and out in its sweep to comprehend each and every one of the 365 days that span the distance between the harvests, and beyond which no harvest of the preceding year is sufficient to reach out to another twelvemonth to feed the hungry of earth.

Today we are to try and set this prayer in the light of all the meaning of Christ when he prayed it. These words of petition for our daily bread are mighty in their significance. They are almost infinite in their sweep of possibilities and relationships. All the ministry of spring is in it; all the ministry of summer is in it; all the ministry of sunshine and shower are in it. Day and night, heat and cold, frost and falling rain—all these are in it. The light that has come from unthinkable distances is in it, and breezes that have blown from far away, and the powers of nourishment that for a million years have been preparing in the mother earth—all these are in it. It is no little thing, then, to ask for our daily bread, for the request has to do with seasons that are sometimes fickle, and with all the elements of nature which God has prepared for one grand conspiracy of sunshine and shower that golden harvests in abundance may be gathered in for the sustenance of man.

If it was right for the Master to offer that prayer, which has become a part of the litany of us all, and in which he teaches us to ask him for our daily bread, it is also right for us to look away to the fields, and to the seasons, and to the seed that shall be sown, and to have care that these things are well done and properly attended to. Slothfulness and improvidence have ever met the most bitter denunciations of God and men. "He that will not work, neither shall he eat." "He that soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly." These and many other things have been said by them of olden time, and we have taken up their sayings and made them our mottoes in the life-activities of today.

Christ's life was a living example of the things that he taught. He taught that men should pray without ceasing, and prepare for the crises and duties of life by constant communication with the Source of life and power. His words "Lift up your eyes unto the fields, for they are white unto the harvest"; "Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth laborers," are in keeping with his other prayer that he taught us to pray, "Give us this day our daily bread." It is a practical lesson from his own lips of the forethought that is essential to life. It is his lesson of the secret which makes merchants successful because they anticipate the needs of their patrons and the fluctuations of the market; it is his way of telling the secret of how statesmen are made and the way victors are brought out on the field of battle. They have all given forethought and painstaking care to see that no possible thing has been left undone that might jeopardize success. But he who does not look away to the autumn—who does not watch the clouds and the storms—who does not figure on the things that may happen—who does not pray for the daily bread in terms of constant activity and toil, and in wise forecasting of all that the future may have in store, need not be surprised if the coming days have for him only the disappointments of those who dwell apart with their afterthoughts and vain regrets.

Today's Great Need

Here we are, then, face to face with the facts which confront us as a nation. We must meet them now—or later. The war has robbed many of the fields of the old world of any chance of cultivation. No husbandman can drive the plow deep into the soil and scatter seed in hope of abundant harvest in the autumn. Already the resources of the nations abroad are being counted out in a given number of pounds of wheat and other grain that may be left in the granary, while the rest is confiscated for the good of the government. Hardships beyond all description there are bound to be in the months that are to come, which are beyond anything ever experienced in the annals of modern times and rarely if ever exceeded in the annals of the world. This will be particularly true if the war is prolonged for another year, as many predict, with the increasingly multiplying number of men sent to the front, and the consequently decreasing number of those who are able to till the fields and make ready for the harvests.

How thoughtless we often are that we do not recognize the Giver of all these harvests! But I have noticed that there are times in the heated seasons of the summer when the hot winds from the south blow over the growing fields of waving grain and the farmers begin to worry lest the grain shall be cooked in the field and never come to maturity. I have noticed that in the warm days of summer a cloud sometimes comes up to blot out the sun and the bright day turns suddenly to a day of deep dread, portentous with the devastating wrath of the smiting storm, whose cyclonic fury sweeps away the toil of all the days that have gone before. And I have also noticed that sometimes in the long weeks of early summer, when the stalks should be shooting upward, the rains are withheld, and the sun smites with terrific fury and withers away even the promise of any harvest at all. Such things as droughts and floods, and burning, blasting winds, have ruined and destroyed crops before now. Fortunately these calamities have been local and never general in our country. But we tremble as we stop to give it one honest thought, and consider what it would mean to us this year if such a series of calamities should be general.

My heart is heavy for the many men who are out of employment all over our country. I do believe that it is the will of our heavenly Father that these should be fed. I do believe that it is his will that these should have honest toil and plenty of it. It is my honest conviction that some plan can be devised by which the wheels of progress and prosperity may be set in motion for the welfare and sustenance of these for whom Christ not only prayed himself—but for whom he taught us to pray, and for whom, in a way, we have been praying all our lives as we have been repeating this prayer.

I am well aware of the splendid efforts being made by our social workers and churches and by our secretary of agriculture these things do not seem to me to be quite enough. There has come to me in these more recent days an audacious thought. For some reason I get it out of my heart or mind. In fact, I study the life of Jesus and the lives of the saints through all the ages, I am quite convinced that right in believing that these calls to remember our brothers are calls to self-preservation; call to come Christlike in charity; calls to fulfill the Golden Rule and do unto others as we would that they should do unto us.

If the greatest men of the nation had recognized of divine aid as Washington did at Valley Forge, when he fell down on his knees and implored divine aid in that moment of crisis, which was vouchsafed him; if Abraham Lincoln had not time and again retired to his chamber alone with God, where he poured out his soul for help in those dark days, and if for years the governors of all our states and the President of these United States had not set aside days for prayer, we might not be so bold as it now, but, in this present crisis, important as that there should have been set aside a day for prayer last fall that this nation might in its petitions for the early cessation of hostilities in Europe—right now seems to me a very important time for the nation to meet for a day of prayer that God will put it into the hearts of every man who has an acre of land to be tilled, that he shall put it under cultivation as soon as the frost will permit it, and that he encouraged to redouble his energies for the raising of a vastly greater wheat crop, and oat crop, and corn crop, and of all other grains and cereals ever before in the history of the nation. A day of prayer would supplement, crystallize and make effective in the largest possible measure the many magnificent things already said and done.

Already the Canadian Government has issued a little pamphlet, urging that all of the idle land possible be put under cultivation.

If the men of this nation want a return of prosperity, if they want a return of the day when the larder shall be full and the purse shall have enough to purchase the common necessities of life, let them at once remember that Jesus said: "Whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer believing, ye shall receive." And then let them set aside a day in which the people of America shall recognize God as the giver of the waving grain, and if they give of it, then the inspirer of the passion to feed the hungry of earth as we shall have to do, and as we are even now trying to do, even at the expense of our own poor and needy; and if the inspired passion to make every acre, and every kernel of grain cast into the soil, count for all that it is worth, then he is also the protector of the growing grain, and he will not be deaf to the united cry of such a people.

Has it ever occurred to you how limited the earth's yearly produce? If the earth should refuse to give her harvest next autumn, do you know that there isn't enough to last through another winter? No—not in all the world! There is never enough corn or wheat or cereals in store for any more than a year's consumption. There is never more than enough breadstuffs to last through a single year. What shall we do, then, when the granaries of Europe give out, as they must, and when the granaries of the other parts of the earth give out, our nation should, through unexpected and to unexperienced general drought, or storm, or pestilence, be deprived of her crops?

One dreads to think what the next year would be if a kind Providence will not open the windows of heaven and pour out just the right amount of sunshine and shower, and keep back the burning winds the destroying cyclones and the floods. May God put it into the hearts of all who have it in their power to open the furrows and cast into the seeds of abundance, and to employ every acre. Then shall the doors of industry open, and shall the wheels of commerce begin again their round, then shall the idle return again to their task, and the destitute be clothed and the hungry be fed.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON S. COOPER

The Vision of God

SUNDAY, March 14. Psalm 16: 8. "I have set the Lord always before me." This is the real practice of the presence of God. It is the endeavor to see everything in the light of that presence, and never to regard anything as detached from the divine relationship. In the flat fields of country round about Lincoln everything is viewed in relation to its noble cathedral, up there on the mount. Whether you are toiling in the fields, or walking along the road, or sitting by the way, the cathedral is ever before you, throwing its sacred suggestiveness over every common thing, and to have the Lord always before us on the road, plains of daily life, overlooking our playgrounds and our battlefields, our place of business and our place of worship, the green pastures and the green churchyard—this is to cultivate the vision of God. "I saw the Lord, high and lifted up, and his rain filled the temple."

Not this kind of vision is not easily attained, nor can it be gained in a day. It was said of the late John Westcott that "he only saw because he took time to see." That is where so many of us miss it. We do not give time to see. We are so feverish in our desire that we have no leisure for vision. We are more concerned about movement than we are about vision. We are more ambitious to have the Lord going round than we are to receive the divine anointment. And so the plain has no towering cathedral. The day is not overlooked by the eternal. Life has no sacred mount.

It has been said that the poet is one who "sees the finite in things." Then, in a very rich degree, we can be poets, seeing the infinite in our ordinary world in the country lane, and amid the festivities of a wedding, or in the shadows by an open grave. We can verily "keep the Lord always before us."

Christ's Influence on Our Lives

MONDAY, March 15. Isaiah 12: 1-6. "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation." On the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles, a procession of priests and Levites descended from the temple area, down the long flights of marble steps to the Pool of Siloam at their foot, and drew water in a golden vase. Returning to the temple court they poured it forth flashing on the pavement, while the choristers chanted these words. The Lord was present on such an occasion and was moved to stand up and cry, saying: "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink!"

He said in effect: What you seek in rites and ceremonies, I will give as the result of direct contact and fellowship with myself; and I will do more than supply your individual need; I will enable you to pass on to others of that same living water which I communicate to you. "He that believeth in me, out of him shall flow rivers of living water; and his spake he of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive." The evangelist adds that the Spirit had not been given in his pentecost of fullness, because Jesus had not yet been lifted to the right hand of Power. There is a ray of illuminating light for us all in that remark. The right duty for every Christian soul is to glorify Christ, i.e., to put him in the first and highest position in thought and life. Then he will shed the Holy Spirit in floods of light and power on our hearts, and the holy influence will go forth from us, quicken and inspire others. Remember that the rivers do not end in marshes or malaria-infested swamps. They get always deeper as the river in Ezekiel's vision, till they kiss the brimming sea of Eternity.

Living Close to Christ Day by Day

TUESDAY, March 16. John 17: 23-24. "That they may be with me where I am." There are no characters whose influence upon us is profound and silent, like the influence of the stars. We receive better by being with them, although we may not quite understand how it happens.

Jesus must have understood the marvelous intimacy of personal contact, and the communication of the Spirit, which is far more powerful than the giving of a dogma. Mark tells us that "He appointed twelve that they might be with him"—for his sakes, yes, and also for his sake, for he was often in need of the human touch of sympathy, without which our nature is desolated and finally dies. And now we find him praying in his immortal prayer to the Father, that "they may be with me where I am."

Being with Christ made the early disciples what they were. He formed them anew on the model of his transcendent ideals and ideas. When he left them the world must have seemed blank, emptied of its chief inspiration and meaning for his fishermen; yet he told them in his last intimate talk that he was going away in order that he might be even nearer them in spiritual presence. He did not leave them comfortless, he came to them and walked with them in all those tragic early days of Christianity. Many a time other than when he walked with them on the road to Emmaus their hearts burned within them because he was near. Paul comforted himself in his disconsolate hours with the thought, "Have I not seen Jesus Christ?" and it was Paul who expressed one of the deepest verities of the intimate union of human and divine when he said, "In him we live and move and have our being."

I go out today to meet both known and unknown foes. But I do not venture forth alone. "When my foes came upon me to eat up my flesh," said the psalmist, "they stumbled and fell. Thou, O Jehovah, only makest me dwell in safety."

Today I shall be secure in the presence of Christ. I shall remember the words of Tennyson's Higher Pantheism:

Speak to him, thou, for he hears,
And spirit with spirit shall meet;
Closer is he than breathing,
Nearer than hands and feet.

The Faith That Works Miracles

WEDNESDAY, March 17. John 5: 1-18. "Wilt thou be made whole?" The man was one of a great multitude of impotent folk—blind, halt and withered. Are there not many such even among religious people? They are blind to God's dealings with them and the world. They are halting in obedience—limping where they should run. They are withered, as limbs wither from atrophy, and as branches wither, which are snapped from contact with the parent stem. Are you in that condition? Have you been a long time in that case? Can you say truthfully that you are willing to be made whole? If so, let us together learn the significance of this incident.

This man was looking for some magical movement of the water, which was attributed to an angel, but was clearly the motion of a chalybeate spring. His mind was fixed on the medium and method instead of on God, the source of life and health. He had faith of a kind, but it was in nature rather than in the indwelling energy of the Divine Spirit. Our Lord bade him take up his bed and walk. In this way he forced him to reckon on God, to believe that God was already at work within him, and to use what little strength he had.

This is a profound lesson. Do not wait for some one to help you. Do not wait to feel strength for a certain service or suffering. Act! Act as though you felt able to act! Do things which, in your own poor mortal strength, you cannot do. Be prompt! "Immediately." And as you do what you are bidden to do, you will suddenly discover that you can do it. Ah, the porches of our churches are crowded with people who could achieve magnificent tasks if only they would cease trying to feel, and would start, assured that as their day so would be their strength.

Learning and Doing the Will of God

THURSDAY, March 18. John 7: 17. "He that willeth to do my will shall know of the teaching." The destiny of most men is determined by the will. Regarding Christianity Browning once said, "Would you will Christianity to be true if it can be?" What we will to do is the decisive thing about us.

We read how a young French officer used to pace about his room exclaiming, "I will be a marshal of France and a great general!" He willed this to be true. His desire, his valiant, ardent wish was a presentiment of his success. He became a distinguished commander, and he died a marshal of France.

Oh well for him whose will is strong!
He suffers, but he can not suffer long;
He suffers, but he may not suffer wrong,
Nor moves for him the loud world's random mock.
He seems a promontory of rock, that, compassed round with turbulent sound,
In middle ocean meets the surging shock,
Tempest-buffed but citadel-crowned.

God helps us when we will do his will. All the forces of heaven work on our side. We have put the little water-wheel of our life into the current of God's strong flowing stream. We have obeyed the law of a force, and we command that force.

Note that the passage does not say that he who always succeeds in doing God's will shall know the teaching, but he who willeth, who tries, who keeps trying, who never stops trying even when he fails, who wills that God will teach him the divine purpose for his own life. This means you, it means me, every one, any one. "He that willeth—shall know."

Steadfastness Amid Trials

FRIDAY, March 19. Ephesians 6: 1-13. "And having done all, to stand." Evil days come to us all. People sometimes say humorously that they have "got out of bed on the wrong side." Everything seems to go wrong. The skein is tangled so soon as we begin to unwind it, and it gets worse and worse. In such days the apostle says that probably the most we can expect to do is just to stand. "Having done all, to stand." Stand, as the sentinel did when Pompeii was destroyed, and who was discovered after so many centuries encased in scoria. The doom of the world would not have driven him from his post. He could not go out to fight the elements, but he could remain quietly where he was placed. In such a case to stand is to conquer.

Probably "the wiles of the devil" are harder to withstand than his obvious assaults. To resist flattery, the soft caress, the enticement to ease and pleasure and self-indulgence—this is harder than to breast the raging of the storm. For most of us, under the blandishments of the wanton world appealing to the sensitive flesh, it is only by the miracle of God's grace that we remain steadfast, immovable, and always abounding in the work of the Lord. It is much harder for a soldier to stand patiently and quietly under fire than to charge with fixed bayonet. We need the whole armor of God for such a task as that. No one piece can be dispensed with, because we cannot tell where the enemy will assail. Almost certainly he will attack at our weakest point. We need to read again the story of the good Nehemiah, who was plied by many artful stratagems. He replied to one of them: "I am doing a great work, and cannot come down."

Let us look at our God, at our responsibilities, at our God-given equipment, and having done all, still stand.

Jesus Alone Satisfies the Soul's Desire

SATURDAY, March 20. Mark 9: 8. "Jesus only." When dying, Professor Christlieb said, "I see no man save Jesus only." Happy the preacher who can make his audience see Jesus supremely, while all others fade away in his transfiguring light. When we unveil Christ men are enamored of his loveliness, lost in his beauty. In many portions of our earth men see only Buddha, Brahma, Confucius or Mahomet. Others see idols or images, but Jesus only is the One who can satisfy the soul thirst after God. We see him dimly in history, poetry, art, music and learning, but the Bible portrait is the best, and while you look, you are changed from glory to glory into his image. Bliss is pouring into your being as grace drops from his lips.

Bernard of Clairvaux said, "Jesus is honey in the mouth, melody in the ear, a song of jubilee in the heart, which leaps to the lips." At the illumination of his name, every cloud flies away, serenity returns." Thomas à Kempis said, "O Jesus, brightness of the eternal glory, comfort of the pilgrim soul, with thee are my lips without a voice, and my very silence speaks to thee. Thou my God, my hope and my eternal salvation."

Though we are unable to give such beautiful expression to our consciousness of the Christ, we can let him fill our vision and thrill our hearts as we gaze with love upon "Jesus only!"

Religion and the War

THERE are multiplying evidences that a great spiritual change is being wrought throughout the world, as the war progresses. In France, Germany and England, we hear of crowded churches, of great audiences tense with feeling, of pastors earnestly striving to lead the multitudes nearer to God. It is a time of general awakening; of deep heart-searching; of the dispersion of the clouds of skepticism and unbelief; of a new realization of accountability to God for all the sins and shortcomings of nations, communities and individuals. Reports that reach us show that the peoples are coming back to Him whom they have neglected and forgotten. There is deep contrition and earnest prayer. All these heart-burnings mean purification and a clearer spiritual vision.

This war is one of the means whereby God makes "the wrath of man to praise Him." Though far apart from the actual strife, our own land is feeling the shock of the almost universal conflict. We, too, have begun to look into our own hearts and to question ourselves whether we have been blameless. In the perspective of this war, we see a lesson of the wickedness of populations devoted to the pursuit of wealth and power, pleasure and indulgence, and of the folly of giving selfish aims and desires the foremost place in national and individual life. While the newly aroused Christians of Europe are bowing themselves in the dust and praying for forgiveness, have we no sins in common with them to lament? Are we so fortified in our righteousness as a nation that we are immune from visitation? Have we no evils here at home which we have been tolerating in the blind confidence that they count for little and are but incidental to a growing civilization? Have we no lesson to learn from this great spiritual upheaval in other lands, which is the accompaniment of the physical conflict?

"Man's vocation," says a writer in the Constructive Quarterly, is "to move on endlessly from glory to glory, in the faith of Jesus Christ. . . . If the world receives no inspiration from the faith of Jesus Christ; if we at certain hours fail to bring home to men the one offer which can be of any avail, then we shall have made the great refusal." It is a time for churches, pastors and evangelists and Christian citizens everywhere to bestir themselves for a national arousal and a new movement Godward. We cannot stand still while all the world is in motion.

Palestine's Opportunity

AS THE war progresses, observes a writer in the English publication, the New Statesman, the possibility of building up a new Palestine on the ruins of the ancient home of the Jewish race is more and more in evidence. Christendom, he points out, owes a debt to the Jews in recompense for all the persecutions they have endured in the past centuries. Today they are a comparatively small nation, and would not be able to stand alone; they would have to be protected and upheld by the powers of civilization, under a general agreement, for many years to come. There are several powers, the writer remarks, claiming to have interests in Palestine. England, which had the largest traffic there at the outbreak of the war, under favorable conditions would be the foremost claimant to the right of protectorate. It is recalled that many years ago Lords Beaconsfield and Salisbury negotiated with Turkey with a view to the creation of an autonomous Jewish state in Palestine. After the present war it might be possible to revive this project, not with a single state as the guarantor of Jewish autonomy, but with all the leading nations uniting in a plan to restore Israel to its ancient seat. Students of the Bible may find this prospect closely related to the prophesied restoration. When it does come it will be a landmark in world history.

Christianity and Economy

AREADER asks us to discuss the question: "Where should we as Christians begin to economize?" Here are some interesting figures: Americans have been spending yearly for foreign missions $11,600,000; for chewing gum, $25,000,000. For all church work America spends yearly $290,000,000; for candy the same figure—$290,000,000. To revert to missions—less than twelve million for winning the heathen world to Christ, and two hundred and ninety million for candy. For soda water—hold your breath, still remembering the eleven for missions, and the two ninety for all church work—for soda water $415,000,000! For tobacco, $700,600,000. For jewelry and plate $900,000,000, more than three times the amount spent for churches. For intoxicating drinks, one billion, six hundred million dollars, or six times the amount spent for church work.

Part of the answer to your question is, in the light of these figures, very easy. Liquor—that must be absolutely cut off the Christian's spending account. Tobacco—if we asked each of you to settle that upon your knees you would probably decide it the same way. Candy, chewing gum and soda water—it would perhaps be absurd to say that indulgence in these things is wrong, yet, on the other hand, while so many are starving, and while consecrated money can do as much for God, what shall we say? Jewelry—here, too, the Christian must be strict with himself.

Expensive clothes, house-furnishings, etc.—what shall we say about these? Would not business conditions be badly disarranged if the people started wholesale economies in these things, and would not more suffering result in the end? Well, it is not good for business conditions to have people mortgaging their houses and plunging into debt for costly things for which they cannot pay. Extravagance and wastefulness are not good even for business in the long run. And the Christian must not only be careful to buy only what he can pay for, but must, in the light of the needs of the world, buy only what he needs to provide reasonable comfort, efficiency and pleasure for himself and his family.

The war is teaching Europe, even its royalties, some new lessons about economy. If war is producing these economies, surely the pressure of the crying needs of men's souls and bodies should make the Christian careful. Spend enough for yourself and your household to be kept in the best trim for work. Whatever is harmful, whatever is not really needful, must be left for those who have never heard the call of the self-sacrificing Christ to help him save and bless the world.

The Heretic King

THE recent death of Theodore M. Davis, Egyptologist, calls to mind again the career of King Amenoph IV, or Akhnaton, whose tomb Mr. Davis discovered and excavated in 1907. Akhnaton was the revolutionary king. He was not afraid to attack the creeds and customs of his time, brushing away much of the grotesque and harmful superstitions which flourished, and leading the people to conceptions of God and duty, startling for their truth and clearness.

While he found a large measure of truth, this ancient king lacked the divine power of communicating the truth so that it would be perpetuated. After his death his people lapsed into their absurd and shameful idolatries. It needed the word and the touch of Christ upon mankind to sow truth's seed so that it would live and spread and fructify. Yet it is refreshing to have found, groping among the dark records of the past, the sayings of this insurgent king of long ago, who had a heavenly vision and was not disobedient to it.

The Bible in the Schools

NEW YORK is just now in the thick of a remarkable battle over the Greiner-Tallett bill, a measure introduced in the Assembly at Albany, which calls for the reading of at least ten verses of the Bible daily in the public schools. It has been in the hands of a committee, which recently reported favorably by a vote of 9 to 2. The religious question was injected into the discussion at an early stage. Catholics, Jews and others opposed the bill on the ground of its unconstitutionality, and urged that the Bible would be used to sectarian advantage. Jewish children from the East Side of New York were brought up to plead with the legislators against the measure. On the other hand, the supporters of the bill contend that the opposition is founded in narrow sectarianism, and that the Bible readings would have an elevating influence. No religious instruction is contemplated, "but," said one speaker, "every one with a Christian point of view feels that the Bible is a book of inspiration. The parts to be read are to be chosen by a commission representing all the leading religious leaders put them up to it. As the bill would have a voice in selecting the lessons, it could be no valid ground for their opposition. Dr. J. H. Jowett is one of the strongest advocates of the bill and predicts that opposition will be as soon as the measure is tried. It is understood, however, that there should be no commotion. "Our young people should be made familiar with the Bible," said Dr. Jowett, "because it is our greatest piece of literature, and should be included in our school curriculum." The opponents of the bill are many Lutherans, the Synods of Missouri, Ohio and others, and forty-five Lutheran churches in New York. They hold it as unpatriotic and unconstitutional. The Unitarians also oppose it and the Catholics announced their determination, should the bill pass, of carrying the fight to the Court of Appeals.

The Bowery Mission's Needs

CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have been so largely instrumental in the development of the Bowery Mission that we are proud of the position it now holds among the redemptive institutions of the world, and truly marvelous work it is now accomplishing. As an instrumentality for the reclamation of men, and as a means for aiding unfortunate who are the victims of present economic conditions, it is probably without a rival in the history of civilization.

For a quarter of a century the proprietors and editors of the Christian Herald, backed by the generous support of its readers, have devotedly and persistently striven to achieve this end, and have succeeded.

The beautiful and spacious auditorium of the Bowery Mission is filled to its capacity every evening. The Mission Brotherhood now numbers over 30,000 and its members are found in every part of the globe. At the recent anniversary meeting representatives of twenty-four different nations were present and spoke. In the last session the Free Labor Bureau has found positions for 25,913 men. In the Mission Industries, which occupy three large lofts over the auditorium and the Labor Settlement at Yonkers, N. Y., men are being constantly employed in temporary positions while permanent positions are being secured. Recently a farm of 277 acres has been purchased and equipped in the northern part of Westchester County, where in years to come thousands of men will receive a rudimentary training in farming, thus fitting them for a healthy, wholesome, happy life's work in "God's out-of-door" and at the same time, relieving the congested streets of the city of so many miserable, homeless, idle men.

What a boon and blessing to the community such an institution is can well be imagined.

The cost is tremendous. The feeding of the hungry, the clothing of the naked, the resuscitation of the men half dead through exposure and want, the various means needed for preaching the Gospel of Jesus Christ and thus supplying the motive moral power needed for a life of upright manhood, involve huge expense.

The trustees have hesitated to lay unnecessary burdens upon those who are foremost in every good philanthropic work, and who have recently been much for the war-sufferers in Europe. They have abstained from making the usual appeal through the Christian Herald for funds at Thanksgiving and Christmas. Now, however, in justice to the great work of the Bowery Mission, which they feel must not be abated by one jot or tittle at this most strenuous period of its existence, they deem it necessary to ask the readers of the Christian Herald to lend special financial help.

Once more, therefore, we appeal to you on behalf of this God-honored and God-honoring institution, the old Bowery Mission. If you wish to participate in the effort to rescue precious human lives from degradation, defacement, and despair, and in the work of saving souls from eternal death, please send in your contributions without delay to the Christian Herald Bible House, New York City.

Average Minister's Salary Insufficient

THE last religious census reports the average salary of ministers of all denominations at $663. The few large salaries bring up the average. It is thought that at least one-third of the preachers of the country do not receive more than $400 a year. This is less than the day laborer gets, who digs the garden or mows the lawn, sweeps the street, or empties the garbage cans. This amount is scarcely half of what the bricklayer receives, or a third of what a bricklayer, carpenter, plumber or other first-class tradesman is paid. The states and nation are seriously trying to find out what amount is necessary for the support of an average American family. The investigations have led to a scale of amounts, and it is generally agreed that the minimum living wage is $750. So that a third of the preachers of the country do not get much over half of a bare living wage. And the average minister does not have a salary enough to support him in a decent, respectable manner. Some ministers are not worth the $663, or even $400 a year, but most of them are worth many times what they receive. For a minister to be compelled to piece out his insufficient salary by some outside employment is as humiliating and disheartening to the church he serves as to himself. It is true that some congregations are poor themselves, on the ragged-edge of want and unable to do better; but in most instances the salaries are far below the ability to pay. We do not believe the average congregation intends to be unjust in this matter. It is much of it carelessness, which can be corrected by agitation and the awakening of the conscience on this subject. The minister and his family have the respect and affection of the members of the church and community as few others do. It is marvelous how far preachers' salaries are made to go in clothing, education and benevolence. That they practice an economy that is sometimes painful rather than leave the profession in a condition of loyalty to their divine call. The herd of the clergymen have comfortable salaries; in recognition of this principle laid down by Christ when he sent out his disciples: "The laborer is worthy of his hire." (Luke 10: 7.)

Afflicted Girl Wants Heaven

A DOOR girl of seventeen stood on the street corner of a great city before daylight the other morning crying. An officer, finding her, could get no response to her, and took her to the police station, where she indicated by her motions that she wanted paper and a pencil. She wrote: "I am Minnie Reynolds, seventeen years old, deaf and dumb, and I have no home. I want to go to heaven!" In answer to a telephone call, a physician came and took her to a hospital. The poor girl may have been somewhat deficient in mind, as she was in hearing and speech; or the outer world may have been rough or cruel with her, and perhaps she was despondent and longed for relief. Others with similar misfortune, like Fanny Crosby and Helen Keller, have seen a vision of the Man on the Cross, and have had a life of joy and hope. No, the girl has been discovered, fortunately, by benevolent institutions where she may have a home for which she cried, and Christ, who is in heaven here and hereafter for which she cried. The cries and longings of the poor deaf and dumb child have expression in these words: "O that I had wings like a dove! for then would I have flown away, and be at rest." (Ps. 55: 6.)

Indians on War-Path

ON SUNDAY, February 21, a battle was fought between renegade Ute Indians and a posse of United States marshals near Bluff, Utah, in which one marshal was killed, two wounded and two Indians killed. Surprised by a band of warriors, numerically much superior to what they had expected, the white men were forced back, finding another band of Indians in the rear. The telephone wires were cut just after Marshal Nebeker sent an urgent call for help. The battle between Marshal Nebeker's men and the Utes, under the leadership of Tse-Na-Gat, was the first since the days of old Chief Colorow—warrior brave who made the Utes famous—and the most serious since the days of the Meeker massacre. Tse-Na-Gat took the war-path last October after he had been indicted by a Federal grand jury in Denver for the murder of a Mexican. He joined the reservation in the southwestern section of Utah and since then has defied arrest. He has dared any one to go after him. Marshal Nebeker organized a posse containing the best rifle shots in the cattle ranges of Colorado and Utah. They started from Grayson, Utah, and overtook the Indian force ninety miles away, near Bluff. The deepest anxiety has been felt for fear the white force would be butchered, and the white people of Bluff massacred; but the latest advices are that Marshal Nebeker will be able to summon all the local help necessary to defeat and capture the Indians without having to call for government troops to aid him. The Utes were originally five tribes, under one chief, scattered over the states of Colorado, Utah, California, New Mexico and some other states. There are about 800 of them on a reservation in Colorado and 1,200 on a reservation in Utah. Most of them are friendly me clean. And Jesus, moved with compassion, put forth his hand, and touched him, and saith unto him, I will; be thou clean." (Mark 1: 40, 41.)

Veteran School Teacher Dies

NATHAN PERRY BEERS, the oldest school teacher in New York City, died at his home, West Eleventh Street, the other day, in his ninety-third year. He taught for sixty-six years in the public schools and was principal of No. 15 in Fifth Street between Avenues C and D for fifty-four years. Hundreds of men prominent in the life of New York were his pupils, among them Rabbi Wise, Justices Giegerich, Newburger and Hoffman, Colonel Goethals of Panama Canal fame, and Otto Koenig, president of the Christian Herald. Mr. Beers retired from active service about ten years ago. At the time Mr. Beers began his teaching the region of the city where he taught in one school for over half a century was a succession of truck patches and cow-pastures. No language can describe nor arithmetic compute the influence of the public school teachers on the character of the individual child, or on the building of the state. They take the stream of life at the foundation and direct it in channels to refresh society and to produce beautiful flowers and bountiful harvests of thought and action. What figures can calculate the influence of the teacher on the young life, the best life of New York, for well nigh three score years and ten! How many boys and girls he prepared to make a living and found a home! The old teacher was always simple and modest. He did not have a fat bank account, nor live in luxury; he did not have political preferment, nor was he enrolled among the Four Hundred; the tailors did not take his form or fabric as models for their fashion plates; he was not featured in the newspapers; he had to die to get a stickful or two of space in the dailies and only got that because he was the oldest teacher in the city; yet it is likely that he was one of the most potential characters in the city for the past fifty years, when measured by the highest standards of this life and of the next. That he even had a hand in cutting through the Panama Canal, too, might be urged from the fact that he had so much to do with the early education of the man whose genius and energy were employed in making the two oceans one. All true teachers in the public schools, or private schools, or academies, colleges or universities must take as their model Jesus, the great Teacher, who came to teach the truth, as he did in the inaugural to his ministry when on the mountain: "He opened his mouth and taught them, saying." (Matt. 5: 2.)

Harbingers of Spring Appear

THE weeks are hurrying along and the forerunners of spring are making their appearance. Grasshoppers in Connecticut, the bees buzzing in New Jersey, bluebirds at Rockaway Beach, robins returning from their winter home in the South, and other creatures that have an inner prophecy tell us that the season of light and life, of beauty and love is hurrying to us. They may yet get chilled, or nipped by the frost and the snow; but their prophecies of the future are pretty reliable. The season announcing its appearance is thus described: "For lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone, the flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come," (Song of Sol. 2: 11, 12.)

Bank Cashier Refuses Damages

W. R. HALSEY, cashier of a bank of Hazlehurst, Miss., was struck by a passenger train while crossing the tracks. The claim agent of the road hurried to the injured man's house and offered a liberal sum in settlement. Mr. Halsey said, "Get out from here. I will not take a cent. It was all my fault, and I am happy to get off with my life." The railroad officials said it was the first time in the history of the road that a man had refused damages offered. He was a frank and honest man to blame himself when he was to blame. Amid the perils of body and soul, it is well to remember this injunction: "Watch ye." (I Cor. 16: 13.)

PRAYER-BOOK SAVED SOLDIER'S LIFE

IT IS often that a button, or buckle, or some part of the soldier's uniform deflects a bullet that otherwise would have killed him. The manuscript in Colonel Roosevelt's pocket weakened the force of the cruel ball that entered his breast. In one of the deadly battles in Russian Poland recently a non-commissioned German officer was struck by a piece of shrapnel; but fortunately a prayer-book he had in his pocket was pierced by the ball, and his life was spared by the narrowest margin. The flower of the young manhood of Europe is on the battlefield. Many of the young men from all the nations involved carry Bibles, and words of prayer and worship with them. Most of them, whether they carry their books on their bodies or not, carry faith in God and love for their fellow men in their hearts. Surely the Father of us all will hear the cry of the universal heart for peace, and that soon, and abiding. We are in the midst of a spiritual fight. The apostle describes it with the weapons of defense and of active assault. The officer who carried the book with its Scripture readings from the Old and the New Testament, and its words of devotion, is the type of the soldier of the Cross, who is protected by the spiritual defenses for which the text of the book stands, and is thus instructed: "Stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness." (Eph. 6: 14.)

and the present uprising is not likely to be general. This outlaw leader and the bad red men he has enlisted in the struggle are thus described: "For their feet run to evil and make haste to shed blood." (Prov. 1: 16.)

Leper Masters Wireless Telegraph

IN 1909 Archibald Thomas of Upton was sent as a leper, when a boy, to the colony on Penikese Island, Massachusetts. Cut off from the world, Thomas found entertainment and consolation in the study and practice of wireless telegraphy. He learned to operate a crude apparatus and was licensed by the United States Navy Department a year ago. Later he received a fine equipment, paid for by popular subscription, and often received press bulletins. His disease ran his system down so that he became an easy prey to pneumonia, which took him off. With all his handicap he kept his mind busy and his heart pure, and went out into a world where all iniquities will be made right and he will have a limitless realm for his investigation and enjoyment. The loathsome, painful, communicable, incurable leprosy was the type of sin. Those thus afflicted came to Christ. There is this mention of one: "If thou wilt, thou canst make

THE CALL OF THE AUTO

ONE Sunday morning not long ago the people living in a small but live town in Dakota, according to a newspaper despatch, were interested to see what at first glance looked like a picnic party drive in and proceed to camp at the intersection of the two main streets. There was a round dozen in the party and they clinked down from the apparent motor truck and made arrangements that astonished the crowd. Instead of producing picnic baskets they turned down the sides and ends of the truck, making a platform nearly as large as the small stage of the local opera house. And there on the platform was a small pulpit, a number of chairs and an organ.

The village loafers gasped. They had graciously allowed the respectable portion of the community to go to church, while they chose to lounge around in the bright sunshine, and here was the church coming back at them in the form of a modern speed wagon, and attracting their interest in spite of themselves. For the members of the little band of evangelists lost no time in perfecting their arrangements. The chief of the band stepped up to the pulpit and announced that the morning service was about to begin. The organ boomed forth a glad hymn of salvation, the singers took it up, the crowd around the wagon grew larger and larger, and presently there on the street corners a first-class revival meeting was in progress. When the meeting drew to a close, all too soon for the crowd, men in the latter called out for more, but the leader had to deny them because he had "six other towns" to make that Sunday. But he would be back the following week to greet them all.

This incident is related to give some insight into the possibilities and the unlooked-for uses of the automobile. Time was when the auto was considered merely as a "red devil wagon," designed to provide outlet for the joy-riding instincts of the irresponsible portion of the community. But that day has passed and the motor car has come to be recognized as one of the accepted institutions of modern life as necessary to the evangelist [note Billy Sunday] as it is to the butcher, the baker or the candlestick maker.

We confess in our more youthful days to dreaming of living in the times of Pharaoh, of Julius Caesar, or even of Napoleon, and of having invented the modern motor car, which, with becoming modesty on our part, we presented for the use of the then reigning emperor. And the emperor, recognizing immediately the advantage it gave him over all his enemies, promptly made us his confidential adviser and bestowed upon us his beautiful princess and only child, thus paving the way in the event of his early demise to our becoming the most powerful man in the world, our power, once we got the reins in our own hands, to be used, of course, solely for the uplift of humanity and the glory of God.

What a dream that was! What a foolishly impossible dream, when you come to consider the elements that have been gathered into the making of the modern motor car! For the motor car is not the invention, not even the conception of any one man. If Charles Goodyear, struggling through years of grinding poverty, had not succeeded in perfecting his process of vulcanizing rubber, we might not have had the rubber tire, which makes smooth riding possible. If James Watt had not shown us the mechanical possibilities of confined vapor, or George Stephenson its application to traction purposes, we might not have been able to develop the modern motor engine. If the discoverers of kerosene, or rather its derivative, gasoline, had not developed its application, that engine would probably have remained an impracticable plaything. If Bessemer had not perfected his process of steel making, the automobile might have remained a clumsy wooden buggy in which no one would want to ride. If the scores of scientists, from Franklin to Edison, had not shown us how to harness electricity there would have been no ignition system and none of many other contrivances that are hidden under the fine varnish of the modern car.

It would be practically impossible to compute the amount of benefit which the achievement of the motor car has brought to the world even in the last five years. It is estimated that there are over a million and a half cars in use in the United States today. Think of it! more motors than there are people in San Francisco, Buffalo, Kansas City and Indianapolis put together, or in the whole state of Colorado. Think of the great army of wage earners which find steady employment constructing these machines.

Take the matter of time-saving alone. Has your grocer or your butcher no motor delivery wagon? Then he cannot give you as efficient service as he might, for the tradesman of today must go far afield with his deliveries and the rounds made in the shortest possible time. But leaving the direct money out of it, see how the motor doubles the efficiency of the professional man, the physician, for instance, and even the clergyman. The doctor, every moment spent in traveling from one patient's house to another's is lost to him and often the difference between life and death is widened. It is somewhat the same with the minister who has to find his flock widely separated. Even he can increase his usefulness to his flock by means of a quicker mode of propulsion than the horse provides.

And it is coming. The day when the machine is here. Parents living in isolated communities have found that with a machine to carry them to and forth their children can take advantage of the more advanced schools in the neighboring large places. Friends living far apart have found the machine an easy mode of personal communication. One's horizon broadens under such conditions. It is not so much dependent on immediate neighbors.

The general surge of the modern age as suggested in our opening paragraph is to be felt in the ever-increasing use of the machine—the automobile, the ambulance, the United States mail wagon, the doctor's motor, the emergency delivery wagon; in the increasing number of family cars with which the farmer's wife does her local marketing; in the growing recognition on the part of the farmer that the automobile is an asset which keeps his young people from seeking fields elsewhere (7 per cent. of the farmers of Pennsylvania own motor cars); in the constant increase of good roads a universal benefit, for which the automobile is largely to be thanked.

Now, I had learned from climbing in the Colorado mountains and from the experience of exposure to the severest storms, the worst traveling companion in the world at such a time is John. I politely bowed our old man back into the pocket of my coat, where he did not remain long, but was quickly consumed. I was, walking would be compared with the agony and such companionship. Not an experience is thrust upon me to realize the blessing of common speech is pure. The ordinary intercourse through unconscious dissemination and of New Testament ideals is human life of ours a valuelessness which is the chief of the Cross of Jesus. Truly, it is profitable for the life that is lived. Presently the driver left the road. A few hundred feet he drew up in front of a new-looking house. "Get off, partner; come in and we're about frozen." The roof was no insult on such a day. A woman met us at the door. Another woman entered. Another woman, and another. Suspicions of entirely vanished—the ugly were too evident. "The devil and he will flee from that is sometimes safer. Bit by bit I reached the door. A real builder

"Some folks build for wealth or fame,
And some for lofty station.
But one wise rule, for all the same,
Is: Build a sure foundation."

That's what you do when you build up health and strength by good food and sensible eating. And that is why you ought to get the regular benefit of

Campbell's Tomato Soup

This is not merely a tempting dinner-course or a dainty feature for the formal luncheon. No. It is a wholesome and nourishing food in itself. It is good for anybody at any time. And it fits exactly into all sorts of every-day occasions.

The regular mid-day meal—no matter what you call it; the children's luncheon; the family supper—they all become more appetizing and more nutritious by the addition of this delightful Campbell "kind."

That's the kind of foundation to build on every day. Why not begin today?

The New REO The Fifth $1050

"The Incomparable Four"

Surely This Must Be a Wonderful Car To Enjoy Such a Demand at Such a Season!

Never mind the size of the type—the fact is big and the information vital to you. You will read it in five minutes. Then use the 'phone—there's no time to lose

WHEN WE TELL YOU that March first looked like "May Day" at Lansing—orders for immediate shipment greatly in excess of output—and that, despite the fact the big 25-acre Reo plants were running double shift, and turning out 105 cars per day—you'll agree the condition is remarkable.

OUR SCHEDULE OF DELIVERIES of Reo the Fifth—made in August in the usual course and anticipating the usual "dull season" of January and February—called for 300 cars of this model in January and 450 in February. With March, according to that schedule, would begin the big out-flow.

ALAS FOR WELL LAID PLANS! In January we shipped 1200 instead of 300; and in February, instead of 450, our dealers took 1800 Reo the Fifts—and begged for more.

MIND YOU, THAT was middle of winter—War Year! Just when everybody was trying to convince everybody else that we were enjoying hard times the Reo plants were running a double shift in an effort to keep up with the demand for immediate shipments of automobiles.

CAN YOU IMAGINE any stronger testimony to the splendid qualities of a car than that unusual demand at that unusual season?

"HOW COULD WE SHIP that many cars in those months if our plans called for the lesser number?" you ask. The answer is the whole point to this ad.

KNOWING FROM PAST EXPERIENCE that the demand for Reos is always greater than the supply—for there never has been a time since the first Reo was made that we could supply enough cars for all who wanted Reos—knowing that this demand would be hopelessly in excess of our facilities in the spring months, we planned, as we fondly believed, to meet it.

AT A COST OF OVER $100,000 we had built a warehouse capable of storing 2,000 cars. We planned to run full force on the Reo the Fifth model during the fall and winter months, expecting to ship about 300 cars per month and store the rest against the big spring rush.

WE MADE THE CARS ALRIGHT—but there our plans were frustrated by dealers' demands for immediate shipments. These took the full capacity of the plants for those months—and today there is not a Reo the Fifth in that big warehouse!

ABOUT THE SAME TIME that we laid those plans we also reserved advertising space in several of the most prominent publications to push the sale of those cars in these "off" months. Instead we are now using that space to tell you this story and to warn you against delay in ordering your Reo if you want to be one of the "lucky" ones.

YOU KNOW AS WELL AS WE—if you have watched it at all—that in previous years thousands of would-be Reo owners have been disappointed. Not merely delay in delivery—but the absolute impossibility of getting a car. Factory output all allotted to dealers—dealers' quota all contracted for by customers weeks in advance.

IT IS A REMARKABLE FACT that in years past premiums have been paid for Reos—not to us or to Reo dealers but from one buyer to another who, by foresight, had secured an option on the coveted car—while cars with lesser reputation went a-begging.

THIS YEAR, BECAUSE of the condition above recited—not a car in reserve, factory running double shift and daily demand keeping pace with and absorbing whole output—only those who have learned by past experience and who order immediately, can hope to get a Reo the Fifth.

WE SUPPOSE WE OUGHT to tell you something about this car—it's the usual thing to do in an ad. But bless you, everybody in the world knows Reo the Fifth as "The Incomparable Four." This great product of Reo experience, Reo facilities and of Reo integrity, occupies a place that is unique among motor cars.

REO THE FIFTH comes as nearly being a staple as has ever been designed in an automobile. Since this chassis was developed—and you'll remember we said then it would prove to be "the ultimate car"—finality in all essentials of chassis design—the only changes have been in improvements, refinements of details and in equipment.

IT HAS BEEN OUR AMBITION to make and to keep this the leading four-cylinder car for that great class of buyers who want a car of superior quality at a moderate price.

FROM YEAR TO YEAR as manufacturing conditions have improved—and especially this year when Reo ready cash enabled us to buy when cash was at a premium and to obtain theretofore impossible values—we have given Reo buyers the benefit in the lower prices.

LAST SEASON $1175—NOW $1050—same car, but longer wheelbase and a score of minor but most desirable improvements. Your local Reo dealer will tell you where and why.

MORE THAN FORTY THOUSAND of them today in hands of users—and some of those users are your intimate friends. Ask them. They will tell you more and better than we can. And you'll hear facts about low up-keep cost that will astound you—and that will explain to you as nothing else could the reason for the tremendous popularity, the tremendous in-season and out-season demand for Reo the Fifth—"The Incomparable Four."

DON'T DELAY!

The REO MOTOR TRUCK

"As Reliable as a Chronometer"

Never Was There—Never Will There Be—a Better Time Than Right Now to Modernize Your Delivery Equipment

Unprecedented demand and high prices for horses enable you to make the change—and at a profit

NEVER WAS THERE—never will there be—a better time than right now to dispose of your obsolete—slow, uncertain, expensive—horse equipment and replace it with modern—rapid, reliable and economical—Motor Trucks.

HORSES COMMAND at this time, not only a ready market, but unprecedentedly high prices. This is true of all classes of horses, but especially the heavy draft types, "chunks" and mules.

THE EUROPEAN WAR has created many opportunities for those with eyes to see and minds alert to grasp. This opportunity to do at a stroke that which you have long contemplated but hesitated to do because of the immediate loss you felt you would have to sustain—though convinced the ultimate saving would many times offset that loss—you can now do without sacrifice of time or money.

EVEN IF THAT WERE NOT SO, still it would be the part of good business to dispense, at the earliest possible moment, with a system that is out of step with the times.

YOU CAN COMPUTE the cost of supporting—of replacing and maintaining—horses and horse equipment, but you cannot know the losses you sustain by forfeiting business to your more alert rivals.

THE PRIZE IS TO THE SWIFT these days—business goes to the house that handles it with the greatest dispatch.

THIS IS EQUALLY TRUE of rural and of urban business. The modern farmer and dairyman, no less than the modern merchant, must keep up with the times—and with his competitors—in the matter of trucking equipment.

BUT YOU KNOW THAT. It is a waste of space to discuss the relative merits of the old and the new—that subject has been thoroughly thrashed out, pro and con, and the decision has been made.

IT IS NO LONGER a question of horses or motor trucks. The only question that remains to be decided is—which truck?

AND IN THE CONSIDERATION of that subject let us suggest that in selecting a truck or a fleet of them you follow the same policy to which you have always adhered in buying horses—buy only from a concern whose reputation you know and of which you are sure.

YOU WOULD NOT BUY a draft horse from a wandering gipsy—not though you felt you knew all there was to know about horse-flesh.

THERE'S VASTLY MORE TO KNOW about motor trucks than about horses. And he who is most sure of his "motor-wisdom" is most likely to select the wrong truck if he depend upon his own experience alone.

MIND YOU, the poorest truck made is better—more reliable—more consistent in performance—than the best team of horses. But that is not the point. You want the most reliable truck made. You want the truck that is cheapest to maintain because of needing fewer repairs, and, when repairs or replacement parts are needed can be obtained quickest and at the least expense.

AND OF COURSE YOU WANT the utmost in truck excellence for your money at the same time that you insist on paying no more for it than you can realize on the amount of horse equipment that truck will replace in service.

ALL OF WHICH SAYS—REO. The cardinal quality in Reo cars, as you know, is stability. THAT QUALITY YOU'LL FIND in superlative degree in the Reo two-ton (Model J) truck shown at the bottom of this page.

YOU HAVE NEVER KNOWN a man or a firm to install a Reo truck as a starter and then change to any other make when completing his equipment.

ANY REO DEALER anywhere can tell you about Reo trucks in service and can show you figures in cost upkeep that will astound you. And, though we talk shop service only as incidental to our business—for we believe in "Road Service Built in at the Factory" such as makes shop service unnecessary—yet it is an important fact that you have at your service any one of fifteen hundred Reo dealers at any time or place you may call on them.

LOOK INTO THIS matter of advantageous sale of the horses and equipment. And, before buying any truck, look at this Reo.

IT IS IN SERVICE in more than one hundred lines of business—yours among them. So there's nothing experimental about it. And it carries the Reo nameplate—guarantee of "quality in unseen parts" as well as in places you can see.

NOW—RIGHT NOW—IS THE TIME, the great opportunity to make that change.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

RADIOGRAM FROM PRESIDENT STARTS THE FAIR. By quick work, the Weather Bureau was able to sweep the rain clouds off the sky above San Francisco just in time for the opening of the Panama-Pacific Exposition promptly at noon, Pacific coast time, February 20, a wireless signal from President Wilson at three o'clock, Washington time, setting in motion this mammoth enterprise. Some fifty thousand persons assembled for the formal exercises in the great South Garden that fronts the Tower of Jewels, the grandstand containing about three thousand with the president of the exposition, Charles C. Moore; California's governor, Hiram W. Johnson; the mayor of San Francisco, James Rolph, Jr.; Secretary of the Interior Franklin K. Lane, and many other notables. Nearly a quarter of a million people in all visited the fair on the opening day. There was speech-making and exchange of telegrams with the President and others, the singing of the Panama Hymn, especially composed by Justice Wendell Phillips Stafford, and a civic parade, a portion of which marched through the miles of exposition streets. The exposition is scheduled to last until next December, and if it should slide off into San Francisco Bay tomorrow about $300,000,000 worth of exhibits and $80,000,000 worth of buildings and equipment would be lost to the world. We doubt, however, that this will happen. It is stated in the press that a somewhat novel method of celebrating Washington's birthday at the fair was attempted by some unknown person who sought to create a diversion by dynamiting the Japanese building, sufficient dynamite being placed to wreck the entire exhibit. The Weather Bureau, having done what it thought its duty for the exposition, contented itself with merely prophesying clear, bright weather for the fair on February 22, and in consequence heavy rains caused the great Vanderbilt cup race for automobiles to be postponed until March 6.

YEAST TO BE TAKEN OUT OF PRICES. At the close of February the indications in New York were that the price of bread would not continue to rise and would, in fact, fall back to the immemorial retail figure of five cents a loaf as a result of the agitation against the move of wholesale bakers to turn an extra penny on account of the war.

NEW YORK'S CONSTITUTION CREATES UNEMPLOYMENT. In a lengthy opinion by Judge Cardozo of the New York State Court of Appeals, concurred in by five other members of the court and dissented from by one, the constitutionality of a clause in the labor law prohibiting employment of aliens on public works and the forfeiture of contracts upon violation of the law, was upheld February 25. This opinion follows efforts begun last fall by labor unions to apply the alien labor law to the construction of new subway lines in New York and Brooklyn, and that work has been more or less disorganized ever since in consequence, though about 20,000 men are at present at work under these contracts, many of whom will be affected by the decision, and the contractors, unless some accommodation can be effected, may be placed in a serious condition; they will in any event lose heavily by the decision, it is said, upwards of $150,000,000 being represented in the total contracts so far given out by the Public Service Commission. A bill is pending in Albany to repeal the clause in question, but it is not expected to pass against the strength of the labor union interests. The economic principle upon which the decision of the court is based is that construction of public works is by public moneys, and aliens, having no interest in the common property of the state, must not share in that property on the same terms as those who have an interest.

NEVER PUT OFF TILL TOMORROW THE JOB YOU CAN GIVE TODAY. With the purpose of getting all who expect to have odd jobs done some day or other when they can get around to it, to have them done now in order to provide work for the unemployed, Philadelphia has started a Hire-a-Man Movement.

PIONEER IN DIME NOVEL EXPLOITS GOES INTO CAMP. A favorite rival of school books in a day long past, the forbidden dime novel, packed to the doors with hair-raising adventures, was largely built on the careers of Frank and Jesse James (sons of a respected minister of Missouri), who engaged in the Civil War for the plunder that was possible, and afterward terrorized several states by the depredations of their "gang." Bank robberies, train-wrecking and similar crimes were their forte. Jesse James was finally killed by a rival bandit in 1882, and Frank James then surrendered to the authorities and was put on trial, but was never convicted of any crime. He changed his occupation, however, becoming a farmer, and after thirty years of retrospection the notorious freebooter died on February 18 at the age of 74, little deserving, we fear, such an extended notice of the event in the Christian Herald.

FOGS CONQUERED AT LAST—IF THE IDEA WORKS. It is to be devoutly hoped that the secret of fog annihilation as explained recently before the American Institute of Electrical Engineers will prove a correct one. Electrically caused precipitation is the principle depended on to clear the way for ships at sea, make London visible to visitors and even brighten up Pittsburgh—for smoke is equally susceptible to this enemy of darkness. Ships will send out a small aeroplane connected with the vessel by a wire, and the electric current will banish fog for a third of a mile ahead; a system of wires will be installed all over London—this is the plan—to ward off fog banks; and the chimneys of great manufacturing plants will be wired to precipitate the smoke before it can escape.

FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE IN STATUE. What is said to be the first statue of any woman not royal was unveiled in Waterloo Place, London, February 24, a statue of the pioneer of army nurses, Florence Nightingale, erected by the subscriptions of nurses, soldiers and sailors.

COUNT ZEPPELIN SAYS, "AMERICA NEXT!" In an interview published in the New York Evening Sun, copyrighted by the United Press, Karl H. von Wiegand reports an interview with the venerable Count Ferdinand von Zeppelin in which the latter declares that a peaceable journey in an airship of the Zeppelin model across the Atlantic to America would be the crowning effort of his career. "My greatest ambition," said the inventor, "has not been to create an engine of destruction, but to demonstrate that the Zeppelins were suited to greater purposes." He believes trans-Atlantic flight to be near at hand and practical aerial navigation assured. He seemed to regret the Zeppelin's part in the war and did not look for any such aerial battle as has been so often pictured as bound to happen.

EVEN THE SKY HOLDS WONDERS FOR THE EXPOSITION'S CROWDS

MEXICO ACCIDENTALLY ESCAPES WAR WITH UNITED STATES. According to a recent press story, an old-time thriller was enacted at Puebla, Mexico, not long ago when our consular agent at that point, W. O. Jenkins, having been arrested by Zapatistas on a charge of allowing soldiers of Carranza to be fired on from his house, was led out before a firing squad of soldiers for execution when, just as the sword of the officer in command had almost reached that delicate point in its flashing signal to the squad which would have marked a severance of diplomatic relations with the United States, an officer of Carranza idly sauntered into view on horseback, to whom Jenkins appealed as an American—and the incident was closed for the time being. Later, on the protest of our government against "discourteous treatment of an American consular agent," Mr. Jenkins was released with an apology, while the reply to the demand for the punishment of the Mexicans who had mistreated him has not, according to the report, been received.

JUST ITCHING TO LEND MONEY. The project which has long been under discussion in various quarters, to provide general facilities to one class and another for borrowing money on collateral not usually accepted by banks, has found expression again in Congress, this time in the form of a rider hitched to the Agricultural Appropriation bill (as a boy hooks his sled behind a cutter) when nobody is looking; the Senate, driving ahead with the bigger measure, and unaware of a Rural Credits bill providing for a Bureau of Rural Credits in the Treasury Department to loan government money through national banks on farm mortgage notes on ten-year terms at five per cent, and in amount of from three hundred dollars to ten thousand dollars, four and a half per cent, twenty-year United States bonds to the extent of $10,000,000 to be issued to provide a permanent fund for this purpose. It is understood that this sure legislation is expected to force acceptance by the House of a form of rural credits.

CATHOLIC PATRON SAINT TO BE ENSHRINED AT WASHINGTON. Originating with the Catholic University at Washington a plan is now well advanced for the erection at the national capital of a $3,000,000 shrine to the "Blessed Virgin," under whose patronage papal affairs are conducted in the United States, the proposed big-domed structure of ve stone to contain many memorials and to be maintained exactly as are the notable shrines of Europe, accommodations being provided for hosts of pilgrims, for elaborate services and great pageants. Funds are being raised by Catholic women through chapters organized in each large city, 15,000 of a contemplated 100,000 members being already enrolled and actively at work, according to Boston Transcript.

SURE SIGN OF CIVILIZATION AMONG INDIANS. Indians of the Northwest have just held their first annual convention as a federation, fifteen tribes being represented by about delegates, both men and women, at the session in Tacoma, Washington, February 21-22. Besides the suppression of the liquor traffic among Indians, government aid for needy old Indians was asked as their rightful due.

THE NEW "BLACK POPE." Recent despatches from Rome announce the election on February 11 of Father Wlodimir Ledochowski, a Russian Pole, as general of the Society of Jesus in succession to the late Father Francis Xavier Wernz, who died August 20, 1914. It is stated in the despatch that the result of the election is a cause of much comment. The chief of the "Black Pope," or head of the Jesuits, is always surrounded by the greatest secrecy. On the present occasion a strenuous effort was made to put the supreme control of the society again in Latin hands, but it failed. When Father Wernz, the incumbent, was chosen, it was regarded as a triumph for the German element. On his death, the office was temporarily filled by Father Fines, the assistant Jesuit general for France, pending the choice of a permanent successor. Wlodimir Ledochowski, the new "Black Pope," and head of the most powerful religious organization in the world, was born in Poland, October 7, 1866, and was the son of Count Antony Ledochowski, officer in the Austrian army. His uncle was Cardinal Ledochowski, prefect of the Propaganda of the Holy See. Wlodimir became page in the court of the late Empress Elizabeth of Austria. He studied in Vienna, Tarnow and Rome, and won high honors in scholarship. He entered the Jesuit order in 1889, and was ordained a priest in 1891. In 1902 he was appointed provincial for Poland, and afterwards was chosen Father Wernz's assistant in the society's work in Europe. The generals of the Society of Jesus are elected for life.

THE MIRACLE AT MOUNDSVILLE

BY EARL E. DUDDING

[The third instalment of an ex-prisoner's story that will have a most interesting development in next week's Christian Herald.]

THE selling of privileges, when I entered Moundsville, was another means of graft. In those days a man who got any privileges had to buy them. The officers carried on this system of graft through the trusty convicts. There are two classes of prisoners: those who are locked in cells, and "trusties," who are given special work to do and have more or less freedom through the penitentiary. For instance, one method of obtaining money was carried on in practically the following manner: With the knowledge of an officer, a trusty convict would interview a convict locked in a cell, saying to him, "You see how easy I have it. I have a job in the office and I can talk as much as I please. You are working in the shop on a sewing machine, from bell to bell. However, if you can get hold of $25 or perhaps $50 I can get you on the lockout. You can have a job weaving the street, or helping the cook."

So he locked-in convict, under inspiration of the trusty, writes to his oldest home, telling them that if they can send him $25 or $50 his condition in prison will become much alleviated; that he has no opportunity to show that he can be a better man, whereas with the freedom of the jail he might be able eventually to work out his release.

That would not do for this letter to go out in the regular way, the convict in the cell hands it to the trusty, who gives it to the officer with whom he is in collusion, and the latter takes it out and mails it. The mother, or the sister, or the wife of the convict pays all the last cow or mortgage the arm order to send the money to the convict in prison. Of course it would be directed to Mr. John Doe, the guard officer out in the city. He would receive the money and the man in the cell would be put on the special privilege list. The officer in return would permit the trusty to do a little grafting on his own account, selling ties, beef, or anything he could sell.

There were men, of course, who had seen other prisons, and from information gathered from them, conditions in a number of other prisons were a great deal worse than in Moundsville. There were three prisoners, I recall, had served time in the penitentiary at Richmond, Va., and they all state that sanitary conditions and cruelties were worse there.

Again, the trusty would engage to make it easier for a man in the matter of taxes, by erasing the record of work from another man's ticket and adding it to the first man's ticket. Or a convict preman working under the contract's foreman would graft through his power to accelerate or retard the operation of a sewing machine. Such a man would let the work out and would be responsible for the oiling of the machine. He would give the convict a good machine if paid for it, or he would fix the machine so it would not run fast enough, thus preventing the convict from making his task. Afterward, he would offer to make the machine run fast if paid for doing so.

I cannot recall all of the graft systems that were in vogue there. You even had to tip the convicts who waited upon you in the dining-room. Everybody demanded pay. If you were a poor man, absolutely without friends or funds, you entered the institution bound to be crushed. You would be so neglected that you would not get enough to eat, and you might die from absolute neglect, in the meantime suffering from many whippings. Money simply had to be procured in one way or another.

In the meantime, the warden of the prison left us and in his place was appointed Mr. M. L. Brown. Before his arrival, I had been given charge of the telephone switchboard. Prior to my taking charge of the telephone, it had been used in many ways to promote the graft system. Warden Brown knew of this and seemed much worried over it. However, after he had learned of my record in the prison, he and I became very good friends. He was a congenial fellow, who tried to be friendly with the prisoners wherever he met them. He gave them all to understand that he was our friend, and as quickly as time would permit he expected to adjust all the things that were going wrong in the penitentiary. The officers began to get scared and to shut down on the petty graft. As telephone operator I was in a strategic position in the penitentiary, and I resolved to help Mr. Brown all I could.

IT WAS about this time that I received a letter from the Christian Herald which had been forwarded from my old address in Huntington, and it asked me to remit a dollar and a half for my yearly subscription which had expired. I wrote the Christian Herald in reply and told them I had lost practically everything I had and that I felt my family needed every cent I had. I told them I was sorry to lose the paper because I believed it had helped me. I asked them to discontinue my subscription, and when I got out of prison I would try and remit them a dollar and a half.

In a few days I received another letter stating that my indebtedness had been canceled and that they would continue to send the paper to me as long as I was in prison. I was so impressed with this letter that the next time Warden Brown came I asked him to read it. He did so and said: "I don't take that paper, but I have heard a great deal of it. It is a mighty good paper for a man to take who is in prison."

Such little incidents mean very much to a man with the prospect of spending years of his life behind bars. Warden Brown was himself a very sympathetic man and I am sure he understood my feelings, because I noticed that his eyes were wet when he finished the letter. So I said to him: "If you will give me permission I will get a few subscribers in this prison for the Christian Herald, just to show them that my heart is in the right place." And he replied: "All right. I will be the first subscriber. Put me down for the paper."

I interested a number of prisoners, and got twenty-eight of the guards to take the paper. All of these subscriptions were sent into the Christian Herald office, and as time went on I did all I could to spread the influence of the paper throughout the penitentiary. Warden Brown became very much interested in the work and grew quite intimate with me. I told him a lot of things that it would have been impossible for him, personally, to have found out. I told him all about the unsanitary conditions. I told him about the graft system and of those who were carrying it on. He got right after the matter, and tried hard to eliminate the evils. He tried to improve the sanitary conditions and did so, one by one. He called the officers together and lectured them on the necessity of improving conditions. He told them what he knew of their conduct in the past; of their grafting on the prisoners; and how he meant to discharge any officer thereafter caught taking anything from a prisoner. He inquired into the whipping business. He opened a police court of his own at which he dictated the punishments. It got so there would not be a man whipped in the course of a week.

The windows of the penitentiary had not been cleaned for years. In fact, the glass panes had been painted over to keep the men from seeing anything of the outside world. Warden Brown had the paint scraped off the windows so that the men could see the trees and the flowers from their cells. He got a better crowd of men on the lockout. Conditions began to improve rapidly indeed.

In the meantime we enlarged our subscription list for the Christian Herald and the influence of the paper on the morals of the men made itself felt. And we all began to work together to help out the warden in his fight for better conditions. The boys read the stories. They read the Sunday school lessons and other departments of the Christian Herald, which was rapidly becoming the most widely read paper in the penitentiary.

Of course, there was difficulty at first, because my motives in offering even the Christian Herald to some convicts were mistaken. The men had had so much injustice done to them, they had been imposed upon so many times that this new project of mine to them meant simply a cloak for a new form of graft. I argued the matter out with many a prisoner many a time in vain. Then I began to take up the individual cases of the men. I listened to their complaints and if I thought the man was worthy I communicated the complaint to the warden, who would call the man over, have a heart-to-heart talk with him and make an investigation. Such men were generally removed from contract work because they stood in danger of bodily harm.

It was necessary sometimes to work through others in order to bring a recalcitrant prisoner to the state of mind where he could appreciate the good the Christian Herald could do him. I remember one instance in particular. There was a negro named Sam Vineyard, who had been sent to the penitentiary for life. One day I went to Sam's cell and told him I wanted him to take the Christian Herald. He cursed me, saying: "You're another one of those grafters who have been walking these tiers grafting off us prisoners."

I knew what he referred to. It had been the custom for the trusties to go among the men and collect money for a better parole system, with the understanding that the money was to be used to test out certain cases of prisoners which had been brought to the courts for adjustment. Of course, the money was never used for such a purpose, but was divided among the officers. Warden Brown had stopped this soliciting as soon as I told him about it, issuing an order that no money was to be solicited from any prisoner except by special permission from him. But Sam Vineyard did not know of this. He told me to get away from his cell, and offered to run a knife into me the next day if I bothered him any further about it.

I went to the guard of his section and asked him to talk to Sam and tell him that I was not a grafter, and that I simply wanted to do what I could to help the prisoners. He did so, and in a few days Sam Vineyard, marching in line past the telephone exchange, asked me to come up to his cell that night to see him. I did so and he said, "I'm sorry I talked to you the way I did. I have been imposed upon so much that I thought you were one of those grafters. Now what about this Christian Herald?" I told him I was not making anything out of it, but was turning over all commissions to help poor prisoners. I went down and got copies of the letters which had been written to me, showed them to him and convinced him that I was on the square. So Sam agreed to take the Christian Herald, and he is one of the most enthusiastic Christian Herald subscribers in the penitentiary today. He will probably remain in the prison as long as he lives.

In New York

The home of good living, where most men lunch down-town, more than 500 restaurants are now serving Van Camp's. These include some big Broadway hotels.

All over the country, thousands of lunch rooms where Baked Beans are a specialty now let our chefs bake them.

And a million homes, where wives delight to please the men, are serving Van Camp's today.

Our only plea is, Leave this question to the man. What he decides, we will accept. Will you?

The question is not Which brand? Neither you nor the man will ever decide that other ready-baked Beans are as good. The verdict lies between home beans and Van Camp's.

VAN CAMP'S
PORK & BEANS BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE

Also Baked Without the Sauce
10, 15 and 20 Cents Per Can

These are the reasons why men prefer Van Camp's:

They are mealy, mellow, whole. Home-baked beans are mushy, broken, crisp or hard.

Van Camp's sauce is baked in, and no sauce that goes onto home-baked beans can match it in delicious tang and zest.

Van Camp's get three times the baking that's possible at home. They are baked for hours, in little batches, by super-heated steam under pressure. Every man learns by a single comparison that Van Camp's digest better than home beans.

This dish is superlative. For 20 years we've given it the very best that's in us. Please give the man a chance to render verdict on it.

Buy a can of Van Camp's Beans to try. If you do not find them the best you ever ate, your grocer will refund your money.

Questions and Answers

Reader, German Valley, Ill. I wonder if you will help me. I want to be a Christian so badly, but cannot find Christ. I try to pray, but it seems to be only a mental effort, and brings no peace, and my mind is so confused that I am almost worn out with the struggle. I have always been a doubter, and now that I want to believe so badly, I find it impossible; Jesus seems to be more of a name than a living personality. I want to love him and trust him, and live such a life as he would have me live, but instead I find my heart filled with coldness.

When people are cold they go where the fire is burning. The very best thing for you would be to find some church which is experiencing a revival of the "old-time religion," or where there is a steady glow of spiritual fervor. It was when John Wesley, after years of seeking, went to the little prayer meeting on Aldersgate Street and heard some one reading Luther's preface to the Galatians, that his heart was "strangely warmed." The fire came from Christ, through Paul and Luther and the little group of faithful, consecrated souls in London who were awaiting God's blessing. This way of finding Christ is especially appropriate for you because you have thought and puzzled about the matter until your brain is tired and should not be put to any further strain. You will find peace by ceasing all effort and simply "letting" Christ bless, and forgive, and save you. Even if you can not find such a gathering as that described above you may, in the quiet of your own room, find peace. Remember Jesus is especially interested in tired folks. "Come unto me," he said, "all ye that labor [or are weary] and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Have you ever stopped to think, not about your own grief, but God's grief, because you do not trust and love him? The death of Jesus is the expression of that grief of God because people had wandered away from him. Come back to him, now, in simple, heartfelt trust, and you will find your sins forgiven and, newly born in your heart, a love for the Saviour who died for you.

J. R. V., Wenona, Md. 1. Judging from the experience of others and myself, I cannot escape the conclusion that very few prayers are answered at once, but God seems to work by process of time according to a predetermined plan. Is this correct? 2. Please suggest some good books on prayer.

1. It depends altogether on what the prayer is. There are many records of instantaneous answers to prayer—as instantaneous as the relief which came when "he touched her hand and the fever left her." Prayers for guidance, for blessing, for relief from pain are often answered immediately. But you are perfectly right in saying that many prayers require time for complete answer. A farmer might pray for a good crop of wheat, but he would have to wait through the months of growing and ripening before his prayer could be answered. Some things for which we pray are like this, and we must patiently wait God's method and God's time. 2. Andrew Murray's With Christ in the School of Prayer; S. D. Gordon's Quiet Talks on Prayer; S. B. Shaw's Touching Incidents and Remarkable Answers to Prayer; Men who Prayed, by Henry W. Frost; Wireless Messages, by C. N. Broadhurst.

Mrs. W. C. E., Cooper Tract, Pa. Is it necessary to fast, since God does not want us to punish ourselves, and since by so doing we cannot atone for sin?

Fasting is not commanded in any New Testament passage. Christ, living under the Mosaic ceremonial law, often fasted, and referred to the custom in speaking to the people, using the expression "When ye fast," or "when thou fastest." Paul has nothing to say about it except in two passages (II Cor. 6: 5 and 11: 27) in which he may simply be referring to the fact that he had often been compelled to go without food in his journeys, imprisonments and disasters. In the Authorized Version there are two passages in which Christ recommends fasting, but the American Revision omits altogether one of these verses, Matt. 17: 21, and in the other, Mark 9: 29, omits the words "fasting." It also omits the word in I Cor. 7: 5, in which, according to the Authorized Version, Paul speaks favorably of fasting. Your arguments are precisely right. God does not want us to punish ourselves; and we cannot atone for sin. Fasting belongs to the ceremonial law. But fasting sometimes is a benefit to the body, for many people are inclined to eat too much. And sometimes a devout soul may grow so concerned in a spiritual matter for which prayer is being made that food will be forgotten. This was doubtless true in the case of Jesus. Also, some one said recently, it is a good thing to miss a meal now and then for the sake of realizing what it actually means to be hungry so that we may sympathize with those who are compelled to live in want.

Miss Agnes E. Dodge, of Boston, sends us this helpful little bit of simple philosophy for the Mail-Bag: "I was hastening down the elevated stairs one morning. As I left the transfer booth and walked along the dark passage toward the turnstile, a broad stream of sunshine suddenly fell before me. I involuntarily held my breath, for the strong light showed up innumerable, infinite particles of dust, scintillating and vibrating in their whirlings. I breathed easier when on the other side of this. As I did so, I said to myself: 'What folly for me to think I am not inhaling those very germs just because I cannot see them as well! Yet they are all around me!' Then I fell to moralizing thus: 'How easy it is to set certain things down as wrong because they are well-defined evils and we can lay our hands on them, but how often are we deceived by the elusive sins that beset us on all sides! The habits that are not vicious but which lead to meaner things: the many shades of wrong-doing which we call enjoyment but which are profitless and deteriorating.' I then decided to turn the bright light of Truth upon my habits, and by it plan a better course for myself."

Mr. T. C. Coffman, superintendent of schools, Clay County, Kan., sends us this very touching letter: "I am enclosing a copy of a petition which I circulated in all my schools. I wondered if it would not be a good thing to have all the other counties in the United States do likewise: 'We, the undersigned children of Clay County, Kansas, beg of you, the rulers of these great nations, to stop fighting at once, and to let the cause of the war be submitted to the Hague tribunal for settlement. We also beg of you to adjust all future difficulties in the same manner. We are the children and grandchildren of your former subjects. We are many of us tied by blood and affection to the soldiers now engaged in this awful war. We beg this on behalf of the helpless children of Europe and Asia, whose fathers are being killed, homes destroyed, and families left in wretchedness and poverty. In the name of all the children in the world, we beg of you to stop this war.'"

Miscellaneous

J. M. G., Rosedale, Ind. Although nothing is said in Scripture on the subject, the presumption is that all the animals lived harmoniously together in Eden.

F. B., Howell, Mich. The question admits of no answer. We have never heard of any one who has presumed to know the mysteries of the divine mind.

Reader, Yonkers, N. Y. Knowing the age limit for children with regard to paying fares, the parent or guardian should make it a matter of conscience to pay, if the child is over age.

S. L. J., Allenton, Mo. While there may be no danger, it would be well to submit the question to a physician, who will advise what measures should be taken. Infection is very subtle, and may exist for years.

L. W. O., Stockton, Calif. When the heart is right with God, the whole being is buoyant and troubles are carried lightly. If we cast our cares upon him, "He will carry us through." Read the Meditations in the Christian Herald on this subject.

Mrs. F. H., Gainesport, Mo. The great majority of the Belgians are Catholics, consequently any immigration from that country would naturally be of that class. We agree in the main with the sentiments expressed in your letter.

W. J. H., Arlington, Tenn., asks: "Why do the American people talk so much about the starvation of the population in the warring countries, and yet keep sending gunpowder and all sorts of things to keep up the war? It seems to me we encourage war for the sake of the money we get out of it, and thus help to make widows and orphans, and then beg to help feed them."

H., Absarokee, Mont. The Christian life is steadily progressive. It may be difficult, and in some cases almost impossible, to convey to the minds of those who have not yet entered the way of life such a conception of its development as they can readily grasp and understand. Not until they themselves travel along that road can they realize the nature and meaning of the experience to be found there.

Reader. We have had occasion before to refer readers who wish to have a good selection of table graces, to the little book, Table Graces for Daily Use; Special Days and Occasions, published by Miss M. E. Munson, Bible House, New York City. This excellent collection of graces for the home and for special occasions is by no means solely for children, as some have thought, but does contain one special chapter for little folks.

MANY WORTHY CAUSES HELPED

IN SEPTEMBER, 1913, Miss Sarah K. Walbert of Frenchtown, N. J., passed away after a life of remarkable Christian usefulness. During her lifetime, Miss Walbert had been a warm supporter of various forms of Christian effort, being more especially interested in Gospel missions and works of Christian benevolence. In her will she appointed as her executors Messrs. Anderson B. Kugler and Harvey H. Johnson. Among other provisions, the will contained a bequest of $1,000 for the benefit of the Christian Herald Children's Home at Nyack-on-the-Hudson, and it further devoted the sum of $6,000, "the same to be applied and distributed by the said Christian Herald, Bible House, to, for and among different charitable objects that may be deemed worthy and needy, and for charitable help and assistance, by the said Christian Herald, Bible House." After deducting an inheritance tax of $300, the total sum of $5,700 remains to be apportioned. This sum having been paid over to the Christian Herald by the executors for the estate, the following apportionment has been made in accordance with the wishes and for the purpose of carrying out Miss Walbert's charitable plans:

FOREIGN MISSIONS

REV. R. A. STARK, VALPARAISO, CHILE, S. A. A devoted and energetic missionary who has practically a whole range of mountains and a chain of valleys as his working territory, and is doing an excellent work among the native population in spreading the Gospel. $100

REV. BERTHOLD LENZ, MAKKAIVIK, LABRADOR. This is a Moravian Mission, and a remarkable one in many respects, being in a region of continuous cold, with exception of a very short summer. The work is among the Eskimos. There is only communication with the outside world by one vessel a year. 100

GOSPEL MISSION OF SAN ANTAO, CAPE VERDE ISLANDS. Rev. J. M. Tourinho, missionary. This is an excellent work among the natives of the Cape Verde Islands. It has been conducted faithfully for a number of years past under very adverse circumstances and is very deserving. 100

NEW HEBRIDES MISSION (Rev. Frank H. S. Paton), MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA. This mission was founded by the famous missionary, John Paton, who gave the Gospel to the savages of Polynesia, including the New Hebrides. This work is now carried on by his son and a corps of assistants and is worthy in all respects. 100

BISHOP J. C. HARTZELL, successor of the late Bishop William Taylor, pioneer of Gospel Missions in a large part of Africa. Bishop Hartzell has founded new missions in Algeria, Morocco, Angola, Zambesia and other parts of Africa, and is constantly visiting his chain of African missions to direct, strengthen and encourage the work. In the north African Missions and indeed throughout the whole country there is the great problem of the spread of Mohammedanism to contend with, making it a difficult field. 100

REV. T. J. BACH, MARACAIBO, VENEZUELA, SOUTH AMERICA. He is one of two missionaries at Maracaibo, on the shores of the lake. It is a mission both by land and by water, and takes in some half dozen villages along the shore of the lake, which are visited by boat in preference to the long and dangerous journey on land. It is arduous work, but has been a means of blessing to many. 100

REV. ROBERT H. BENDER, Central American Mission, San Salvador, Central America. He has for the past 17 years been doing colporteur work and preaching among the natives. He has met with great success, and deserves encouragement. 100

DR. WILFRED GRENFELL, ST. ANTHONY HOSPITAL, ST. ANTHONY, NEWFOUNDLAND. One of the greatest of modern missionaries. He has for many years been a medical missionary to the natives of Labrador, and has been instrumental in bringing about wonderful results both medically and spiritually. 100

REV. LEON B. SALMANS, M.D., GUANAJUATO, MEXICO. Dr. Salmans is connected with a large hospital at this place, in addition to looking after the spiritual needs of the natives. 100

PUNDITA RAMABAI, POONA, INDIA. She is a Christian native of India, a woman of great talent who is laboring among her own people and has done wonderful work in the way of establishing institutions for the upbuilding of the natives. She has been rewarded by seeing many wonderful results. 100

CHINESE ORPHANAGE COMMITTEE, 92 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK CITY. This is a fund to enable the missionaries to take care of 1,000 poor little Chinese orphan waifs, distributed among over twenty mission stations. It has been in operation nearly ten years and has done a great work of child-saving and child-training. Many thousands of little Chinese children who were made orphans by the floods, famine, pestilence and war, have been rescued, evangelized and educated. 1,000

RELIEF FUND FOR THE WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF THE EUROPEAN WAR. Established by the Christian Herald and now conducting relief work in six different countries within the war area, with committees in each of the following cities: Brussels, Rotterdam, Paris, Vienna, Berlin and London. This fund sent the first American cargo of food into Belgium. 1,000

HOME MISSIONS

TUSKEGEE INSTITUTE, TUSKEGEE, ALABAMA. Founded by Booker T. Washington, designed to elevate the negro race. Very worthy. 100

MAYESVILLE INDUSTRIAL INSTITUTE, MAYESVILLE, S. C. Miss Emma Wilson, president. An industrial educational institution for poor negro boys and girls. They are trained to earn a living for themselves at farming, brick-making, and other avocations. 100

SOUL WINNERS' LEAGUE, DR. E. O. GUERRANT, PRESIDENT, WILMORE, KY. A large and very active and successful missionary society laboring among the poor mountaineers of Tennessee, Kentucky and South Carolina. 100

PACIFIC GARDEN MISSION, CHICAGO, ILL. A rescue mission for men and lads. Conducted by the widow of the founder. Very worthy; doing an excellent work. 100

SUNDAY BREAKFAST ASSOCIATION, PHILADELPHIA, PA., serves breakfast every Sunday morning to the homeless and destitute, after which a religious meeting is held. 100

THE BOWERY MISSION AND YOUNG MEN'S HOME, 227 BOWERY, NEW YORK CITY. Incorporated under the laws of the state of New York in 1897. This is a mission of great usefulness, the largest of its kind in the country. It deals with the destitute and unemployed men and boys who have strayed from the right path and fallen into poverty and trouble through wicked causes or misfortune. It has a mission hall and brotherhood rooms at 227 Bowery, together with a Free Labor Bureau, which finds work for some 4,000 unemployed every year. It has an industrial annex in the Bronx. 1,000

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD CHILDREN'S HOME, NYACK, NEW YORK. Established in 1891; incorporated under the laws of the state of New York in 1899. A fresh air work on a very large scale for the poor children of the tenements who have no other means of getting an outing. It shelters from 2,500 to 3,000 children every season. No denominational or sectarian lines; has many beautiful buildings on 30 acres of property; one hour from New York. 1,000

URGENT NEED FUND. This is a special fund for use in deserving cases where immediate relief is advisable. It has been largely used in furnishing quick relief in cases of dire necessity through epidemics, fires, floods and similar causes. Also extends relief to worthy individuals where the case is known to be really deserving. 200

A copy of the foregoing list was forwarded to the executors of Miss Walbert's will and checks for the amounts indicated were sent to each of the missions and organizations on the list, the whole transaction being completed within a few days after the receipt of the money from the executors.

This generous offering comes at a time when, on account of the war and its far-reaching influence, it will do a great deal of good to all of the worthy causes that are beneficiaries under the will. Miss Walbert's noble generosity should be an inspiration to others. Her gift will cause her name long to be remembered with gratitude and blessing by those who are devoting their lives to Christian work at home and abroad.

THE Carews had been at the Harrington homestead nearly a week when one evening John Pendleton and Jimmy called. Pollyanna had been hoping they would come soon. She had, indeed, urged it very strongly before the Carews came. She made the introductions now with visible pride.

"You are such good friends of mine, I want you to know each other, and be good friends together," she explained.

That Jimmy and Mr. Pendleton should be clearly impressed with the charm and beauty of Mrs. Carew did not surprise Pollyanna in the least; but the look that came into Mrs. Carew's face at sight of Jimmy did surprise her very much. It was almost a look of recognition.

"Why, Mr. Pendleton, haven't I met you before?" Mrs. Carew cried.

Jimmy's frank eyes met Mrs. Carew's gaze squarely, admiringly.

"I think not," he smiled back at her. "I'm sure I never have met you. I should have remembered it—if I had met you," he bowed.

So unmistakable was his significant emphasis that everybody laughed, and John Pendleton chuckled:

"Well done, son—for a youth of your tender years. I couldn't have done half so well myself."

Mrs. Carew flushed slightly and joined in the laugh.

"No, but really," she urged; "joking aside, there certainly is a strangely familiar something in your face. I think I must have seen you somewhere, if I haven't actually met you."

"And maybe you have," cried Pollyanna, "in Boston. Jimmy goes to 'Tech' there winters, you know. Jimmy's going to build bridges and dams, you see—when he grows up, I mean," she finished with a merry glance at the big six-foot fellow standing before Mrs. Carew.

Everybody laughed again—that is, everybody but Jamie; and only Sadie Dean noticed that Jamie, instead of laughing, closed his eyes as if at the sight of something that hurt. And only Sadie Dean knew how—and why—the subject was so quickly changed, for it was Sadie herself who changed it. It was Sadie, too, who, when the opportunity came, saw to it that books and flowers and beasts and birds—things that Jamie knew and understood—were talked about as well as dams and bridges, which (as Sadie knew) Jamie could never build. That Sadie did all this was not realized by anybody, least of all by Jamie, the one who most of all was concerned.

When the call was over and the Pendletons had gone, Mrs. Carew referred again to the curiously haunting feeling that somehow she had seen young Pendleton before.

"I have, I know I have—somewhere," she declared musingly. "Of course it may have been in Boston; but—" She let the sentence remain unfinished; then, after a minute, she added: "He's a fine young fellow, anyway. I like him."

"I'm so glad! I do, too," nodded Pollyanna. "I've always liked Jimmy."

"You've known him some time, then?" queried Jamie, a little wistfully.

"Oh, yes. I knew him years ago when I was a little girl, you know. He was Jimmy Bean then."

"Jimmy Bean! Why, isn't he Mr. Pendleton's son?" asked Mrs. Carew, in surprise.

"No, only by adoption."

"Adoption!" exclaimed Jamie. "Then he isn't a real son any more than I am." There was a curious note of almost joy in the lad's voice.

"No, Mr. Pendleton hasn't any children. He never married. He—he was going to, once, but he—he didn't."

Pollyanna blushed and spoke with sudden diffidence. Pollyanna had never forgotten that it was her mother who, in the long ago, had said "No" to this same John Pendleton, and who had thus been responsible for the man's long, lonely years of bachelorhood.

Mrs. Carew and Jamie, however, being unaware of this, and seeing now only the blush on Pollyanna's cheek and the diffidence in her manner, drew suddenly the same conclusion.

"Is it possible," they asked themselves, "that this man, John Pendleton, ever had a love affair with Pollyanna, child that she is?"

Naturally they did not say this aloud; so, naturally, there was no answer possible. Naturally, too, perhaps, the thought, though unspoken, was still not forgotten, but was tucked away in a corner of their minds for future reference—if need arose.

CHAPTER XX

SUMMER DAYS

BEFORE the Carews came Pollyanna had told Jimmy that she was depending on him to help her entertain them. Jimmy had not expressed himself then as being overwhelmingly desirous to serve her in this way; but before the Carews had been in town a fortnight he had shown himself as not only willing but anxious—judging by the frequency and length of his calls, and the lavishness of his offers of the Pendleton horses and motor cars.

Between him and Mrs. Carew there sprang up at once a warm friendship, based on what seemed to be a peculiarly strong attraction for each other. They walked and talked together, and even made sundry plans for the Home for Working Girls, to be carried out the following winter when Jimmy should be in Boston. Jamie, too, came in for a good measure of attention, nor was Sadie Dean forgotten. Sadie, as Mrs. Carew plainly showed, was to be regarded as if she were quite one of the family; and Mrs. Carew was careful to see that she had full share in any plans for merrymaking.

Nor did Jimmy always come alone with his offers for entertainment. More and more frequently John Pendleton appeared with him. Rides and drives and picnics were planned and carried out, and long delightful afternoons were spent over books and fancy-work on the Harrington veranda.

Pollyanna was delighted. Not only were her paying guests being kept from any possibilities of ennui and homesickness, but her good friends the Carews were becoming delightfully acquainted with her other good friends the Pendletons. So, like a mother hen with a brood of chickens, she hovered over the veranda meetings, and did everything in her power to keep the group together and happy.

Neither the Carews nor the Pendletons, however, were at all satisfied to have Pollyanna merely an onlooker in their pastimes, and very strenuously they urged her to join them. They would not take "No" for an answer, indeed, and Pollyanna very frequently found the way opened for her.

"Just as if we were going to have you poked up in this hot kitchen frosting cake!" Jamie scolded one day, after he had penetrated the fastnesses of her domain. "It is a perfectly glorious morning, and we're all going over to the Gorge and take our luncheon. And you are going with us."

"But, Jamie, I can't—indeed I can't," refused Pollyanna.

"Why not? You won't have dinner to get for us, for we shan't be here to eat it."

"But there's the—luncheon."

"Wrong again. We'll have the luncheon with us, so you can't stay home to get that. Now what's to hinder your going along with the luncheon, eh?"

"Why, Jamie, I—I can't. There's the cake to frost—"

"Don't want it frosted."

"And the dusting—"

"Don't want it dusted."

"And the ordering to do for to-morrow."

"Give us crackers and milk. We'd lots rather have you and crackers and milk than a turkey dinner and not you."

"But I can't begin to tell you the things I've got to do today."

"Don't want you to begin to tell me," retorted Jamie, cheerfully. "I want you to stop telling me. Come, put on your bonnet. I saw Betty in the dining-room, and she says she'll put our luncheon up. Now hurry."

"Why, Jamie, you ridiculous boy, I can't go," laughed Pollyanna, holding feebly back, as he tugged at her dress-sleeve. "I can't go to that picnic with you!"

But she went. She went not only then, but again and again. She could not help going, indeed, for she found arrayed against her not only Jamie, but Jimmy and Mr. Pendleton, to say nothing of Mrs. Carew and Sadie Dean, and even Aunt Polly herself.

"And of course I am glad to go," she would sigh happily, when some dreary bit of work was taken out of her hands in spite of all protesting. "But, surely, never before were there any boarders like mine—teasing for crackers and milk and cold things; and never before was there a boarding mistress like me—running around the country after this fashion!"

The climax came when one day John Pendleton (and Aunt Polly never ceased to exclaim because it was John Pendleton) suggested that they all go on a two weeks' camping trip to a little lake up among the mountains forty miles from Beldingsville.

The idea was received with enthusiastic approbation by everybody except Aunt Polly. Aunt Polly said, privately, to Pollyanna that it was all very good and well and desirable that John Pendleton should have gotten out of the sour, morose aloofness that had been his state for so many years, but that it did not necessarily follow that it was equally desirable that he should be trying to turn himself into a twenty-year-old boy again; and that was what, in her opinion, he seemed to be doing now! Publicly she contented herself with saying coldly that she certainly shouldn't go on any insane camping trip to sleep on damp ground and eat bugs and spiders, under the guise of "fun," nor did she think it a sensible thing for anybody over forty to do.

If John Pendleton felt any wound from this shaft he made no sign. Certainly there was no diminution of apparent interest and enthusiasm on his part, and the plans for the camping expedition came on apace, for it was unanimously decided that, even if Aunt Polly would not go, that was no reason why the rest should not.

"And Mrs. Carew will be all the chaperon we need, anyhow," Jimmy had declared airily.

For a week, therefore, little was talked of but tents, food, supplies, cameras and fishing tackle, and little was done that was not a preparation in some way for the trip.

"And let's make it the real thing," proposed Jimmy, eagerly—"yes, even to Mrs. Chilton's bugs and spiders," he added, with a merry smile straight into that lady's severely disapproving eyes. "None of your log-cabin-central-dining-room idea for us! We want real campfires with potatoes baked in the ashes, and we want to sit around and tell stories and roast corn on a stick."

"And we want to swim, and row,

STRENGTH

Without Overloading the Stomach

The business man, especially, needs food in the morning that will not overload the stomach, but give mental go for the day.

Much depends on the start a man gets each day as to how he may expect to accomplish the work on hand.

He can't be alert with a heavy, ed meat-and-potatoes breakfast, requiring a lot of vital energy in digesting.

A Calif. business man found a good combination for producing energy. He writes:

"For years I was unable to take a breakfast food that had nutrition enough to sustain a business man without overloading his stomach, causing indigestion and kindred ailments."

"Being very busy and also a very nervous man, I had about decided to give up breakfast altogether. But luckily I was induced to try Grape-Nuts."

"Since that morning I have been a new man; can work without tiring, my head is clear and my nerves strong and alert."

"I find that Grape-Nuts, with a little sugar and a small quantity of cold milk, makes a delicious morning meal, which invigorates me for the day's business."

and sh," chimed in Pollyanna. "She stopped suddenly, her eyes on Jamie's face. "That is, of course," she corrected quickly, "we wouldn't want to—to do those things at the time. There'd be a lot of quiet things we'd want to do, too—read and talk, you know."

Jamie's eyes darkened. His face grew little white. His lips parted, but no words came. Sadie Dean was speaking.

"Oh but on camping trips and picnic you know, we expect to do outdoorsy things," she interposed feverishly; "and I'm sure we'd want to. Last summer we were down in Maine, and you should have seen the fish Mr. Brew brought. It was— You tell it," she begged, turning to Jamie.

Jamie laughed and turned his head. "They'd never believe it," he objected. "a fish story like that!"

"True," challenged Pollyanna. Jamie still shook his head—but the color had come back to his face, and his eyes were no longer somber as if in pain. Pollyanna, glancing at Sadie Dean, vaguely wondered why she suddenly settled back in her seat with a very evident air of relief.

At last the appointed day came, and a start was made in John Pendleton's new touring car with Jimmy at the wheel. A whirr, a throbbing, a chorus of good-bys, and they were off, with one long shriek of the men under Jimmy's mischievous gear.

In later days Pollyanna often went back to her thoughts to that first night in camp. The experience was new and so wonderful in so many ways.

It was four o'clock when their forty-mile automobile journey came to an end. Since half-past three their big car had been ponderously picking its way over an old logging road, not designed for automobiles. For the car itself, and for the hand at the wheel, the part of the trip was a most wearisome; but for the merry passengers, who had no responsibility concerning hidden holes and muddy ruts, it was nothing but a delight owing more and more poignant with every vista through the green chequer and with every echoing laugh they dodged the low-hanging branches of the trees.

The site for the camp was one known to John Pendleton years before, and greeted it now with a satisfied light that was not unmingled with relief.

"Oh how perfectly lovely!" chose he others.

"Gee you like it! I thought it would be about right," nodded John Pendleton. "Still, I was a little anxious, after all, for these places do vary, you know, most remarkably in places. And of course this has grown up to bushes a little—but not that we can't easily clear it."

Everybody fell to work then, clearing the ground, putting up the two tents, unloading the automobile, building the campfire, and arranging the kitchen and pantry.

It was then that Pollyanna began peculiarly to notice Jamie, and to fear him. She realized suddenly that the hammocks and hollows and pine-tree knolls were not like a carpeted floor or a pair of crutches, and she saw that Jamie was realizing it, too. He was also that, in spite of his injury, he was trying to take his part in the work; and the sight troubled her. Twice she hurried forward and intercepted him, taking from his arms the box he was trying to carry.

"Be, let me take that," she begged. "You've done enough." And the next time she added: "Do go and sit down somewhere and rest, Jamie. You look so tired!"

If he had been watching closely he could have seen the quick color come to his forehead. But she was not watching, so she did not see it. He did see, however, to her intense surprise, Sadie Dean hurry forward a moment later, her arms full of boxes, and heard her cry:

"Oh, Mr. Carew, please, if you would give me a lift with these!"

The next moment Jamie, once more struggling with the problem of managing a bundle of boxes and two crutches, was hastening towards the tents.

With a quick word of protest on her tongue, Pollyanna turned to Sadie Dean. But the protest died unspoken, for Sadie, her finger to her lips, was hurrying straight toward her.

"I know you didn't think," she stammered in a low voice, as she reached Pollyanna's side. "But don't you see?—it hurts him—to have you think he can't do things like other folks. There, look! see how happy he is now."

Pollyanna looked, and she saw. She saw Jamie, his whole self alert, deftly balance his weight on one crutch and swing his burden to the ground. She saw the happy light on his face, and she heard him say nonchalantly:

"Here's another contribution from Miss Dean. She asked me to bring this over."

"Why, yes, I see," breathed Pollyanna, turning to Sadie Dean. But Sadie Dean had gone.

Pollyanna watched Jamie a good deal after that, though she was careful not to let him, or any one else, see that she was watching him. And as she watched, her heart ached. Twice she saw him essay a task and fail; once with a box too heavy for him to lift; once with a folding table too unwieldy for him to carry with his crutches. And each time she saw his quick glance about him to see if others noticed. She saw, too, that unmistakably he was getting very tired, and that his face, in spite of its gay smile, was looking white and drawn, as if he were in pain.

"I should think we might have known more," stormed Pollyanna hotly to herself, her eyes blinded with tears. "I should think we might have known more than to have let him come to a place like this. Camping, indeed!—and with a pair of crutches! Why couldn't we have remembered before we started!"

An hour later, around the camp-fire after supper, Pollyanna had her answer to this question; for, with the glowing fire before her, and the soft, fragrant dark all about her, she once more fell under the spell of the witchery that fell from Jamie's lips; and once more she forgot—Jamie's crutches.

Among the Workers

—EAST ST. LOUIS, ILL., has been greatly stirred by Evangelists Hart and Magann, thousands being in attendance daily. The effect upon the civic conditions of the city is said to have been excellent.

—THE BROWN-CURRY revival meetings at Long Beach, Calif., were held in a tabernacle seating about 4,000 people. Several times it was taxed beyond its capacity, and overflow meetings were held. Hundreds took a stand for God and right living, many of them young men and women of the high school. One night the pastor and six hundred members of the First M. E. Church attended in a body, and other churches and organizations followed their example.

—EVANGELIST ROBERT JOHNSON is in the midst of a tabernacle campaign in Brookville, Pa., after having just closed a series of evangelistic meetings in Lehigh, Pa., which resulted in a large number of decisions. As a result of the meetings in Lehigh it is said the saloon business has been cut in half and two saloons have been forced to close. On February 18, Evangelist Johnson conducted a large meeting in Punxsutawney Baptist Church. Hundreds arose asking prayers.

—EVANGELIST CHARLES REIGN SCOVILLE reports what he feels is destined to be his greatest union meeting at Akron, Ohio, a city of 80,000 to 100,000 population. The tabernacle was centrally located and all the Protestant churches co-operated. Eight thousand people packed the building almost nightly, and overflow meetings were held Sunday nights and several nights during the week. This party consists of Mr. Sandy, superintendent of personal work, and wife; Bruce Holmes and wife; Superintendent of Tabernacle Construction Marty and wife; musical directors, Mr. Coffin and Miss Robinson; Mrs. Scoville, soloist and superintendent of girls' work; Thomas P. Ullom, assistant evangelist. Salvation Army Hall was packed with overflow meetings on the night of February 21, and three of the evangelist's party spoke to overflow crowds on the street.

EASTER PRESENTS FROM THE HOLY LAND

WHEN the president of the Christian Herald visited the Holy Land last year he procured a number of special olive wood covers with which to bind the Pictorial Life of Christ, the Red Letter Bible and the Red Letter Testament, for such good friends as might wish to use them as Easter gifts. Naturally only a limited number of covers could be obtained, and these have been bound upon the volumes mentioned below and are now offered to any member of the Christian Herald Family who desires to obtain an especially unique and appropriate Easter gift.

The Pictorial Life of Christ illustrated with 82 magnificent photographs taken from the original wax and clay sculpture by the famous artist, Mastroianni. The text by the Rev. Ira S. Dodd tells the story of the life of Jesus in simple, attractive language. This volume will instantly attract attention wherever shown. Size 7 x 10 inches.

We will send you, postpaid, a copy of the Pictorial Life of Christ, bound in olive wood, and the Christian Herald for one full year for only $4.00. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, a copy of the book as a reward for sending us four new subscriptions to the Christian Herald, at $1.50 Each.

Red Letter Bible—Bound in Olive Wood

Authorized or King James Version unchanged. In the Old Testament the passages quoted by our Lord or directly related to incidents to which he refers are printed in red. In the New Testament the words universally accepted as those of the Saviour are printed in red. Contains full references, concordance, subject index, and dictionary, maps, etc.

We will send you, postpaid, a copy of the Red Letter Bible, bound in olive wood, and the Christian Herald for one full year for only $4.00. Or, we will send it to old subscribers FREE as a reward for sending us four new subscriptions to the Christian Herald at $1.50 each.

JONATHAN AND HIS ARMORBEARER

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR MARCH 21. I SAM. 14: 1-46

The Heroism of Jonathan

By Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell

JONATHAN was the disciple of faith, hope and love in the olden time. His matchless love will be treated in a subsequent lesson. His sublime faith in God's leadership is seen in the daring exploit up the cliffs of Geba. Jonathan knew he was entering upon a dangerous mission. In the eyes of men it was a foolhardy adventure, but, having interviewed his God, he said to his armor-bearer, "There is no restraint to the Lord, to save by many or by few." His perfect trust in God was like that of Moses before Pharaoh, David before Goliath and Daniel before the lions.

Faith never considers numbers, physical forces or human power. When faith locks arms with God, as Enoch did, it walks with him in complete composure.

Jonathan had the assurance of a sign, as Gideon did in the fleece. The Philistines in the garrison who received them were probably not ready to defend themselves and became panic-stricken at the sudden onslaught. When twenty of their comrades had fallen the balance in the fortification fled, believing that the whole army of the Hebrews was coming up the mountain side. Their flight produced consternation among the hosts of the Philistines, who fell upon each other as the Midianites did. There was a trembling like an earthquake, which increased the fear in the hearts of the enemy until the rout was complete.

Saul, perceiving the commotion, pursued the Philistines, while all Israel came out of their dens and caves, assisting in the overthrow. Saul inquired, "Who did this? Where is Jonathan and his armorbearer?" Jonathan had taken no one into his confidence, not even his father, the king. He censured all his movements that he might win a victory in the name of the Lord.

Lord Nelson had some of the Jonathan spirit. When chafing under inactivity, he cried, "Give me Westminster or victory!" Our own Patrick Henry uttered a similar sentiment, "Give me liberty or death!" Jonathan was battling in self-defense for home and native land.

Life is a battle, whether for physical existence or spiritual being. "Greater is he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city." Fighting the enemies of the soul is the highest type of warfare. It is not a sharp, short encounter, but is only fought to a finish when the last enemy, death, is overcome. Many of those who are luxuriating in quiet ease have surrendered to the enemy—slaves of sin—prisoners of Satan. We must fight if we would win the good fight of faith; put on the

"Let us put on the armor of light." Rom. 13: 12

A Roman army, according to this conception, is sleeping in its tents, while the sentinel goes to and fro on his beat. Presently as the morning light begins to glimmer in the east, he lifts his voice and cries: "Comrades, it is high time to awake out of sleep: the night is far spent, the day is at hand, let us put off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light." A little later the apostle says: "Let us put on the Lord Jesus Christ." Probably we talk too much of what we put off and too little of what we are putting on. There are two methods by which the evergreens may be robbed of their leaves. They may be torn off with violence, or be quietly pushed off by the up-rising sap of the spring. Surely the latter is preferable. It is thus that we should grow into the likeness of our Lord. Let us put on Christ; ever endeavoring to act as he would do, if he were in our place; always trying to please him. Then, almost insensibly, the old evil things will drop away, because no room is left for them. The armor of light is not put on in all its symmetry and beauty by one act. We put it on in flakes. It grows on us like the ice on a pond by almost insensible additions. We continue to add fresh layers each day as we abide in Christ. Old things pass away; and all things become new.

whole armor of God and go forth with moral muscle and spiritual prowess. Christian conquerors do not count their victories like the Indians, by the number of scalps, or like the warrior, by the millions slain, but by their captives for Christ, the multitude of the redeemed.

Let us go forth as the armor-bearers of light, with no blots of defeat on our shields, following the Captain of our salvation into the very ranks of the enemy, till all the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of the Prince of Peace.

We should never excuse ourselves because we are only one against a multitude. So Luther was against Romanism; Livingstone, Morrison and Carey against heathenism. Be true to your convictions and you will be called to do heroic work for the King. The little conflicts in your everyday life will make a great sum of victory in the end.

Christians and the War

By Arthur H. Howland

SUPERINTENDENTS and teachers should be very careful, in teaching these battle lessons, to point out the better and higher ideals of peace which Christ brought to earth. The Old Testament is largely a story of strife; the New Testament a message of peace. The first word of the announcing angel was, "Fear not!" and the angels who gathered around him sang: "Peace on earth."

Christ did say in one stern passage, "I am not come to send peace on earth, but a sword." He knew that his message would awaken antagonism in the hearts of evil men and that they would persecute his followers. His message would rouse others to take the sword, but the whole spirit and tone and phraseology of his message were that his followers should be men of peace, not men of war. There is one recorded statement which seems to take another view: "He that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one" (Luke 22: 36). But in the account in Matthew he said plainly: "Put up again thy sword into its place; for they that take the sword shall perish with the sword" (Matt. 26: 52). Jesus did not believe in bloodshed. There can be no doubt about that. "Blessed are the peacemakers," he said. And how clear and emphatic are the words, "But I say unto you that ye resist not evil," and "I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you."

Perhaps our Quaker friends go to an unwarranted extreme in insisting that fighting is absolutely never justified. To deliver others from oppression, to defend from attack those for whose safety we are responsible, it may sometimes be justifiable to resort to force. But the whole meaning of Jesus to the world is that men should live together in love and co-operation, not in hate and strife. Jesus' teaching about the value and sacredness of human life, his toil in relieving pain, his intense interest in the bodies as well as the minds and souls of men, his concern for the comfort of all whom he could help, his glorification of love, insisting that every man should love every other man, make it impossible to think of him in any other light than as an enemy and detester of war.

Dr. Eliot, in his recent Philadelphia speech, in which he made so many distressing attacks upon the doctrines and institutions held sacred by faithful Christians, did point out some real weaknesses and faults of the church, among which was the free and frequent use of war terminology in our counsels, prayers and hymns. To be sure, the Christian life requires courage; to be sure, we must in our souls strive against evil, yet the constant expression of our Christian career in terms of warfare is dangerous, inconsistent with the real me spirit of Jesus. Paul used, occasions, the phraseology of he, too, preached and lived t love. Though a Roman citizen no reason to believe he eve a sword, and cannot imagine so. And the words with summed up his life are not so rendered "I have fought fight" as "I have played game," being the language n of but of athletics.

It is extremely unfortunate following the program work the International Committee before the war began, we m reading the terrible news o battles during the week, spen in Sunday school studying o full battles fought long ago. day's lesson the time will spent in talking about Jesus attitude toward strife and bloodshed than about this Jonathan's, brave though it w led to such a vast slaughter o enemies.

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

Conducted by Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

DO YOU favor a Sunday school teacher staying with one department or going forward with the class when the class is promoted?—H. M.

A. This is the oft-recurring question brought to the front by the graded system. In dealing with over a thousand teachers in the twenty-nine years of my superintendency, and with a carefully graded school, I do not observe hard and fast rules on this question of promoting teachers. In the elementary years I favor the teachers staying by the departments, through the primary at least. I frequently promote with the class a Junior teacher in passing to the Intermediate (13 to 16) years, because that teacher's influence with a particular class may be vital in launching them through the rapids of the early teens. Then, too, I must have a place in the Junior Department for the young teachers who are graduating from the teacher training class, and therefore some teachers must be promoted out. In passing from the Intermediate to the Senior again I would give first consideration to that teacher's ability to understand and guide the boys and girls over the hard years of the later teens, for here is the largest leakage in the ordinary Sunday school.

Q. We want to invite the parents of our department for a social evening. What can we do to make it a success?—W. McB.

A. One of the departments of our school (the Intermediate) had a most successful affair recently for the fathers and mothers. The committee prepared a form letter which they put in the hands of the teachers to be sent to the parents and reading as follows:

"DEAR FRIEND: On Tuesday evening, June 9, the Intermediate Department scholars will hold a social of an unusual nature, and believing that their relatives and friends would enjoy being present, we have planned to include them in this evening of fun and sociability.

"As a teacher in that department I would like to visit and invite you personally, but finding myself unable to do this, I am hoping this letter will be accepted as a personal invitation.

"Trusting that I may have the pleasure of greeting you, I am, Cordially yours,"

You can be sure the parents were on hand. Altogether 200 or 250 were present.

Four songs were mimeographed and with two blank sheets of paper for the autograph game were tied together in book form with the Intermediate colors of blue and white. Each guest was handed one on entering the room. Three prizes were given, one a picture for a parent, a baseball mit for a boy and a fan for the girl obtaining the most autographs of the guests present within a certain length of time. And the people got acquainted.

The program was as follows: Selections by the department orchestra; department song; drill by department girls; solo, The Rosary (a girl); Annie Laurie (all); banjo selections (a girl); shadowgraph (ballad of Mary Jane), department boys; song, The Lorelei (all); Topsy Turvy chorus by department boys; selections by orchestra; autograph game; address by superintendent; refreshments; song, Home, Sweet Home.

Q. I teach a Sunday school class of twelve to fifteen boys, ranging in ages from 14 to 16 years. When I get down to the lesson and solid facts I find it hard to hold their attention, but if I will interject a story occasionally and draw my illustrations from the story, they seem to be interested. Is there any book or helps in illustrations that I can use which will enable me to fire the lessons and hold their attention?

A. There is no book of illustrations at planned in connection with the uniform lesson. There are, however, choice illustrations on the lesson in Peloubet's and Tarbell's Notes, and many of the denominational Senior Quarterly Lessons. There are several books of general illustrations from which selection can be made if application: Anecdotes and Morals, Albert Banks, containing over 500 illustrations drawn from everyday incidents, accompanied by a forceful character lesson cloth, $1.50; Spurgeon's illustrated Aids, arranged under subjects and topics, list price; Treasury of Illustration, by Ward Beecher. Although published years, it is a book full of pungent illustrations, homely phrase and flashing wit; $2.50. Art for Pulpit and Platform, by James Ward Beecher. He has arranged material clearly and methodically so that it is easily available for speakers who wish to treat some particular topic. List price, best illustrations, however, are often drawn out of observation, daily incidents in newspapers.

FRANKLIN

50 degrees below Zero, 120 degrees in the Shade*

IN Strassburg, in the 12th Century, there was built a wonderful clock. It rang all sorts of bells. It gave the phases of the Moon. It was full of wheels and pipes and pulleys. It was so wonderfully complicated it required constant attention. So they only ran it on Sundays and Fête days, and on these days it told the time.

Then some bold spirits said—Give us a clock that will run all the time!

That is about what has happened with the automobile.

Men used to brag about what they had in their car. Now they tell you what they have gotten rid of. They are looking for simplicity, not complexity.

They used to think that with a multiplicity of parts they were getting more for their money—radiator, pipes, fittings, gears in the fly-wheel, automatic devices in connection with the starter, spark control; torque, reach and other kinds of rods tying the axle to a ponderous body.

Now they know that every time they get rid of something on an automobile they add to their peace of mind.

The Franklin achieved one of the biggest things in the automobile business when it established direct-air-cooling and did away with plumbing. Nothing to freeze in winter or boil in summer. No radiator to nurse up the hill on a hot day or to blanket every time you draw up to the curb in cold weather. No fussing with anti-freezing mixtures.

A car that you can use all the time.

59 per cent. of Franklin owners are men who have owned other standard makes of automobiles.

There are so many things about the Franklin that are different. There are so many results obtained in its use that are different, in comfort, luxury and easy riding qualities, that these men never get over telling you how it does every thing any other car ever did for them—does it better and at less cost of operation.

Every one is aware now of the growing interest in air-cooling both in this country and in Europe.

The Franklin over a period of fourteen years has perfected a direct-air-cooling system that is attracting the attention of the world.

If you want to know how satisfactory is the Franklin direct-air-cooling system talk to a Franklin owner, or go to a Franklin dealer and ask him to show you how thoroughly Franklin direct-air-cooling cools.

The Franklin National Cooling Test settled that question for all time, when on September 24, 1914, 116 Franklin stock cars in 116 parts of the country ran 100 miles each on low gear without stopping the engine.

Among fine cars the Franklin is the exponent of scientific light-weight.

The Franklin Six-Thirty Touring Car weighs 2750 pounds and the price is $2150.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.

"Sweet Land of Liberty"

To the Saxon owner, America becomes in a new sense the "sweet land of liberty." The region "just beyond the hills" or the show places of the continent are alike within your reach.

You can go anywhere you want, in your daily business rounds or out on pleasure tours, in this sturdy, willing car. No roads are too rough and rugged for it; no mountain climb too difficult.

Saxons Prove Reliable in Daily Use

Thousands of Saxons, all over the land, are proving their wonderful touring ability, as well as their all 'round daily utility. Saxon was the first car to cross the country from ocean to ocean on one continuous trip over the Lincoln Highway. It traveled the entire 3389 miles in 30 days, averaging about 30 miles to a gallon of gasoline.

Letters from all parts of the country tell of the stylish Saxon's never-failing and economical performance.

Mrs. Ray. M. Mackey of San Antonio, Texas, writes: "My Saxon is very easy on tires and gasoline. It has the power to climb hills on country roads and to get in and out of traffic on crowded streets without difficulty. I like its neat and up-to-date appearance."

Two Saxon owners, G. W. and J. W. Logan recently drove from their home city, Tiffin, Ohio, to Los Angeles, California, over every possible condition of road—at a total cost for car operation of $38.60.

Ideal Car for Every Day Motoring Needs

Mrs. E. J. Parenteau of Pittsburg says: "I have driven my Saxon about 5,500 miles and have found it ideal for country driving as well as city use—at an exceedingly small upkeep. On a recent trip from Pittsburg to Monongahela, we took the wrong road, covering a route where no automobile had ever gone before. So we feel quite proud of our Saxon."

W. P. Hensley of the Calumet & Hecla Mining Company, Calumet, Mich., writes: I use my Saxon in my work and for pleasure trips, too. It climbs the hills that some of the big cars simply can't negotiate. And it has cost me so far sixteen cents a day to run it and I have averaged over 30 miles per gallon of gasoline. My wife and I expect to drive out to the Panama-Pacific Exposition in it next summer."

Wonderful Saxon Motor Wins This Owner

Dr. E. J. Marsh of Oswego, N. Y., gives this testimony: "I have driven my Saxon nearly 3,000 miles. There isn't a prettier working engine in the world."

Saxons are popular with ministers. Note this from the Rev. G. W. Bush, Eliot City, Md.: "My car has given perfect satisfaction. Made a perfect trip to Indiana and return."

From Paul E. Reiff, Saxon owner in New Cumberland, Pa., comes this evidence: "The car does the work to my entire satisfaction and can climb hills on high gear that lots of machines are obliged to take on second."

Travel Independence Now Within Your Reach

The two-passenger Saxon—priced at $395—brings motoring within the reach of everyone.

Saxon is a big car for the price—wide and roomy enough for two large people to sit in perfect comfort. It is sturdily built, smooth riding with light but powerful and flexible motor. Due to its superior design it is light in weight—the modern idea in automobiles—that's why it is so economical to run. Because it contains good materials and is strongly constructed, it has the strength to stand the hardest work; it will go the pace for years.

The 1915 Saxon has many improvements which make it even more desirable than before. Saxon is the modern car—distinctive, graceful. It is a car you'll be proud of. It is thoroughly up to the minute in every detail. Electric lights and starter, specially built for the Saxon, furnish when desired, as extra equipment.

"Saxon Days," our interesting magazine, contains more proof of Saxon's superiority in construction and performance. We will gladly send you a copy upon request. Saxon dealers are everywhere—get in touch with one nearest you or write us for his name. Address Dept. K.

Saxon "Six" $735

This is a big, handsome five-passenger car—of exceptional value. It is fully equipped, including Gray and electric starting and lighting system, and has features usually found in cars of much higher prices. 12" wheelbase, roomy, comfortable streamline body, cantilever 32x3½" tires, demountable rim, man top, speedometer. You place yourself to see this modern car placing an order.

The Doorway of the Old Home

The doorway of the old home
Is stained with age and small;
And in the early twilight,
When purple shadows fall
Across the little doorstep,
My half-shut eyes can see
A row of clear-cut visions,
That stand and smile at me.

The doorway of the old home
Has often opened wide
For schoolgirl and for student,
For mother and for bride;
And soldier feet have traveled,
While eyes were dim with pain,
Across the narrow threshold,
That ne'er came back again.

The doorway of the old home
Has heard love's stories told;
Has seen the splendid autumn
Of people growing old.
And baby hands have fumbled
At lock and heavy key;
And feeble arms stretched from it
To children out at sea.

The doorway of the old home
Is stained with age and small;
And yet in glowing summer,
In winter and in fall,
It gives a cheery welcome,
And knowing eyes may see
The row of clear-cut visions
That stand and smile at me.

Let's talk sense about motor car economy

There has been a lot said about what is and what is not motor car economy. You may have been told that it is economy to buy a cheap car. But you can clearly see that the first price is not the real cost of any automobile. A cheap car—like most other cheap things—is pretty expensive in the long run. After all, it's really the monthly price you pay—the upkeep cost for service—that tells whether your car is economical or not. Now, upkeep cost depends upon three things—gasoline cost, oil cost and repair cost. Let's face these facts frankly and figure out in which of these three there is a chance for the greatest economy.

The Big Saving Isn't in Gasoline

There are other "Light Sixes" as sparing of gasoline as this Chalmers. We admit this frankly. But then—the most you could possibly save in gasoline wouldn't amount to much. There is less than $25 difference in a season's gasoline cost between any two "Light Sixes" on the market.

The Big Saving Isn't in Oil

Nor is the Chalmers $1650 Light Six-48 more saving in oil than many other "Light Sixes."

But oil is the cheapest thing you buy for your car. A season's cost of oil for any car is really a minor expense.

But Here's Where There's Real Saving

It's your repair bill that determines the real cost of your car. For one repair bill will wipe out a season's saving in oil and gasoline. So the car that has the lowest repair expense—the $1650 Chalmers Light Six-48—is the cheapest car to own. Its service costs you least. And your satisfaction and comfort are consequently greater.

The Chalmers Light Six-48 "Stays Put" —that's Why It Is So Economical

Four big features of this car enable it to stand the hardest service without noticeable effect.

These are—right construction, right weight (undue weight is bad—under weight is worse), proper balance and scientific distribution of weight, and best quality materials. At the point of service where some "Light Sixes" begin to rack and jar and develop need for repairs, the Chalmers Light Six-48 is running smoothly, "sweetly" and powerfully. At the time other cars begin to pile up repair bills this car goes on its way holding expense down to the lowest notch.

A month by month comparison with other "Light Sixes" during the past season will prove every statement made about this car's remarkable economy.

Make a note on your memo pad to see the Chalmers Light Six-48 today, at your dealer's.

"Unto the Church in—"

A WORK-WEARY man in one of our big cities left his desk one afternoon and went out on the street to clear his thoughts and rest his mind. He was not an important man, as importance goes—excepting possibly to his own family. To his own family he represented a home, clothing and food, care in sickness, love and protection. In business he was but a cog in a great machine. A faithful, busy cog upon which at times the whole machinery turned. But the world would never know the part he played in producing the good for which his business was famed: he knew, and sometimes he felt that God knew; and, as it was his rule in life to do whatsoever he did as unto God and not unto men, he was content.

That is, he was content to a certain degree. But the man was human, and, like you, he would sometimes grow weary in well-doing. Weary for delayed appreciation, delayed reward. He did to grapple with and solve many problems of his work, alone. He had to grapple with and solve the problems of providing for his family. Like you and others, he had to endure misunderstanding, injustice, hardship. Matters did not always come out as planned, debts would accumulate, hope would be blasted, discouragements were always dogging his way. And on this day a special task worried him and he was too weary to grapple with it. So he went out seeking a sanctuary from the enemies to his peace.

THE outside air braced him a little. But he was too tired to note the street scenes, for his mind still turned at bay now upon this care and now upon that. He did not remember when he had been so harassed and so near despair. But presently he halted before a quiet little church in the middle of a block tightly wedged in between two stores. Toilers were hurrying by in either direction unmindful of a plainly printed sign at the doorway: "This church is open for rest, meditation and prayer. 'Come ye yourselves apart and rest awhile.'" He entered, as he had all along intended to do, for this was not the first time he had seen that invitation.

Have you ever stepped inside a church that is kept open in this way, stepped in out of the turmoil and cold and unfriendliness of a city street?

The man made his way to a retired seat near a pillar, he noted how the light was mellowed by the stained windows. On Sundays the oaken pews, the carpeted aisles, the furniture of the pulpit and of the choir, never looked quite so restful. And how still it was! Scarcely any one else was in the room, but when now and then some one entered and selected a place for meditation, his movements had a far-away and softened effect. The hush that pervaded the room was like the fragrance of a rose garden that imparts itself to every one near. The man experienced a sense of other-worldliness as he leaned his tired head against the pillar to rest.

It was strange, but this sense of other-worldliness completely possessed the man. His vast burden of care seemed to have remained in the vestibule, like some wrap which he did not wish to take inside. He could almost have doubted the reality of the burden which he must take up when he should leave that restful spot. A sense of being in the presence of God filled his heart. A sense, a new sense of the reality of the burden-bearing Christ came upon him. A sense of sonship warmed his heart and exalted his soul. He began to grow courageous—yes, eager for the battle that must be fought day by day for his loved ones. And as this transformation came over him he began to muse. And thus he mused:

IF an empty church can lift me away from the troubles of life nearer to the throne of God, what would a church filled with the redeemed of the Lord be able to do for a weary world! How is it that the world is not fleeing to the church as a sanctuary from the storms of life? How is that this sacred building when emptied of worshipers is filled with the angels of God?

Is the church no longer his sanctuary? Has the church forgotten that Christ came to the world to save sinners? Why are not these seats filled with men and women fleeing from the wrath to come? Is this no longer the sanctuary of God? Is it, as a sneering world has said, a club-house for the spiritually weak to do?

Quite suddenly the man had a vision of that world. He saw most plainly that it was the same world that Jesus came to save. Like the beggar the world is, it has its need with the rags of wealth, and jingles in futile pretense the coins of prosperity, but its heart is sore and weary—and Friendless. Sin has dragged it down and it knows no place of refuge from the storms to come.

Somehow, he mused, the church had overlooked the fact of sin. The church had overlooked the underlying cause of poverty and suffering and unrest. That men and women were sinners still until saved by the grace of Christ had ceased to be the reason for the Sunday services and the mid-week prayer meeting and the Sunday school and the young people's societies. Christian culture had become the church's objective. Christian culture can be sought by eminently respectable people in entirely respectable clothing. And such people and their children can be so congenial—at times. Congeniality on Sundays makes for hearty singing, and for sympathetic listening to the choir and the preacher, and for liberal giving, and for a complacent sense of activity and accomplishment—

"AND knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked," mused the man by the pillar.

He leaned forward and took a well-worn Bible from the pew rack. There was light enough to read by, and he turned to that passage and read it, and some others:

"Nevertheless, I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love.

"And unto the angel of the church in Sardis write." Sardis? mused the man; Sardis? In which state is that town? "I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead."

And again: "I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot; I would thou wert cold or hot."

And still again: "As many as I love I rebuke and chasten."

And then: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock..."

Through the man's memory ran a refrain of his boyhood, and the words came with it: "Knocking, knocking; what, still there! Waiting, waiting; oh, so fair!" He replaced the Bible and went out.

At the door he shouldered his burden again and swung into the crowd on the sidewalk, hurrying past the door with its sign: "This church is open for prayer, meditation and rest. Come ye yourselves apart and rest awhile." Standing just outside was a wistful Figure, he thought, that tried to halt each anxious-faced man, each slouching woman, each evil-looking youth; tried to halt them one by one and turn them toward the door of his sanctuary.

The man looked back once or twice over his shoulder as he hurried to his office; the Figure still was there, the crowd pressing past unseeing, unheeding, unresting.

ALL this that has gone before is true, even to the vision of the Christ there before the door of his empty house.

How was it that no one perceived him standing there? How is it that the world in its need gives scant thought to the sanctuary provided for a refuge from the storm, a shelter in the time of need? Is it so in your town? What would Christ today direct the scribe to write to the angel of the church in—? Or don't you have any angels in your church today?

There was one most significant thing about that tired man's experience. He saw Christ standing before the door of a church, trying to turn sin-sick men and women into it. True, it was an empty church. Perhaps on a Sunday he would take up his stand elsewhere. What do you think? Is there any reason why he would try to direct weary souls to your church on a Sunday?

THE experience of this man is told here for a purpose. He that hath an ear to hear, let him hear.

Let him hear the growing murmur against indifferent church members. Let him hear the thunder of criticism being hurled at the church because of them. Let him hear the ribald jeers of the underfed, the unhoused, the unemployed. Let him hear the voice of his own conscience. Let him hear also what the Spirit saith unto the churches:

"Behold, I come quickly; hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown." "He that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him shall I give power over the nations." And again: "Behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it." And yet again: "If, therefore, thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee."

THE great center of interest during the week has been the allied attack on the Dardanelles, preparatory, if successful, to the siege of Constantinople. Constantinople has been besieged so many times, oftener in fact than any other city in the world, that one siege more can hardly be viewed as a novelty in its history.

The first siege was in 450, the next in 553, then in 626 and in 666, and then one each year from 672 to 679. Next in 717, followed by one in 782. Then the Slavs besieged it four times from 865 to 1043, and the Hungarians tried their luck in 924; the years 1081, 1203 and 1204 were marked by sieges; so was 1422, and finally, under Constantine Palæologus, Constantinople yielded to Mahomet in 1453, and with it fell the Roman empire of the East.

Only three of these sieges were successful. The city has thus often been the aim, rarely the prize, of invasion. By a somewhat curious coincidence, the present Sultan bears the same name as the original Turkish conqueror.

It has been said for many generations, almost since the fall of the city, in fact, in 1453, that the cross on the wall of St. Sophia, which shows vaguely through the whitewash with which the interior of the church was daubed by the Moslem conquerors, would one day show again in the full light of day. That day now seems almost to have dawned, to the extent at least that the city will probably in the next two or three weeks be under the guns of a Christian fleet, though whether the city itself will be in the possession of the Christians is another question, which will depend for its answer on the number of the land forces the Allies will be able to bring to the scene of operations.

The Dardanelles themselves are at a considerable distance from the city and are forty-seven miles in length, narrowing at one point to just under a mile in breadth. In the center of this narrowest part there is a deep but very narrow channel. Near shore on both sides of the channel the water is quite shallow. This narrow portion of the strait is about midway between the entrance and the Sea of Marmora, and the shores rise abruptly to a height of four to five hundred feet, while at the same time the course of the strait curves considerably.

The forts are located on the hills, and it is this combination of difficulties which constitute for battleships the hard part of the problem, for a battleship must elevate the curve of its projectile sufficiently to reach the forts, while on the other hand the forts will be able to shoot down on the battleships.

The western side of the strait is formed by the long, narrow peninsula of Gallipoli, which, at the narrow part of the strait, is about fifteen miles wide. On this peninsula there is a force of from 60,000 to 70,000 Turkish troops, and any landing force will have them to reckon with. Opposite on the Asiatic side of the Dardanelles there also is a force of Turkish troops.

Great Britain is about to land or has landed troops on both the Asiatic and European sides of the straits. The landing forces consist of some French troops from Morocco, Senegalese, Australians, Canadians and some few native Egyptians. How strong these are numerically is not stated, but if they exceed 40,000 all told at present it will be rather surprising. A French general, D'Amade, commands this mixed force.

The bombardment of the forts defending the passage began on February 19, and at a late hour on March 5 the allied fleet had succeeded in penetrating to a point about fourteen miles from the entrance, approximately opposite Kephez Bernu, after destroying the forts at the entrance and those on the way, so that the really difficult part of the work has still to begin. Landing parties have attempted to complete the work of the ships, but not always with success, as the Turks have driven them back to their ships quite often. The British allied casualties to date in men are somewhere in the vicinity of 750; those of the Turks cannot be accurately stated, but are more numerous.

The total number of war vessels engaged in this effort is said to be fifty-two, of which the greater part are British, which, as usual, occupy the dangerous positions, the French vessels being employed on the lighter and less exposed work. The identity of the British fleet is not accurately known. The Queen Elizabeth, one of the few warships extant carrying 15-inch guns, is certainly present, and so is the Agamemnon, a pre-dreadnought battleship, the Vengeance, the Canopus, which was in the battle of the Falkland Islands, both of the same class, and the Dublin, of the cruiser class. These are all that can be stated with certainty. The material damages so far sustained by the fleet do not, as far as we hear, amount to much. The Agamemnon and the Vengeance are said to have been hit, and two torpedo boats and two mine-sweepers are said to have been sunk. It must, however, be remembered that our news as regards casualties is necessarily limited.

While these things are taking place in the straits themselves the French fleet is engaged in bombarding from the Ægean Sea the northern neck of the Gallipoli Peninsula at its narrowest point, where the land is barely three miles wide, between the Ægean Sea and the Sea of Marmora, the object being to cut off from Constantinople the Turkish troops now on the Gallipoli Peninsula, and to prepare for the landing of allied troops here. How much progress has been made towards these ends is not easily discernible from the scanty reports which have come in.

According to the reports which reach the American Government from our ambassador to Turkey, Mr. Morgenthau, the Turks are planning for a stubborn defense of all the outlying positions along the Sea of Marmora and the approaches to Constantinople. Earth fortifications are being thrown up, and the experiences of this war have shown that earth fortifications are most effective in resisting the tremendously powerful artillery of these days, and the activity of the Turkish forces is such that there seems to be little question of the intention of the Ottoman Government to make a desperate fight against the invading forces.

In 1807, the British Admiral Lord Nelson, after a long and hard fight, succeeded in forcing the passage from the Dardanelles with a fleet and in re-opening the Sea of Marmora, but was unable to proceed farther and had great difficulty in getting back. Reasoning by analogy is, however, very unreliable in this case, because of the tremendous change in conditions. On the whole, the probabilities seem to incline towards the success of the allied fleets as far as forcing the passage from the Mediterranean to the Black Sea is concerned, but whether they will be able to hold this passage, once won, and to capture and hold Constantinople rather depends on the land forces which are able to dispose of. It is apparent that they wish to use Russian aid in this or in any other way as little as possible.

Several things besides finance were discussed at the recent meeting of the Russian, British and French finance ministers at Paris, and credible reports from serious sources are in circulation that Russia made a formal demand among other things for the opening of the Dardanelles, and that unless Great Britain succeeds in forcing the straits Russia will conclude a separate peace, and that Great Britain is aware of her intention and that this is the reason why the British forces in the west have not been more heavily reinforced than they have been.

Russia is supposed—this word is used advisedly because it may turn out not to be a fact—to have an enormous quantity of wheat concentrated in the south of Russia, which, the passage from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean being closed to her, she has been unable to get to a market; and even the prospect of the Dardanelles being opened has caused the price of wheat to fall rapidly and severely in the markets of the world.

At the moment the political consequences of the opening of the Dardanelles need not be entered into now more than to say that it hardly seems probable that the Balkan states, which still cherish ambitions to possess Constantinople some day, will be very joyed at the city's passing into either Russian or British hands, as such a possession would be a death blow to their hopes and ambitions in this direction.

The situation in Belgium is improving rapidly. The railroad, telephone and telegraph employees have returned to work; the mines in the south, which have been closed since last August, are slowly resuming operations and numerous factories are also beginning work in tentative fashion while the reports from the agricultural districts indicate that the usual spring work in the fields is being largely carried on.

Little news has come to us during the past week concerning the minor campaigns—the Russo-Turkish, the fighting in Africa and Asia or the Albanian attack on Servia. The German submarine campaign has not been prosecuted vigorously during the week, probably because Germany is awaiting the results of the American negotiations with Great Britain on the food question. The case of the Wilhelmina has not yet come before the prize court, while the Dacia, which was taken into Breslau by a French cruiser, has been declared forfeited to both hull and cargo, by the French maritime prefect. But this, of course, does not end the matter.

The only naval activity during the week with the exception of the attack on the Dardanelles was the bombardment of Antivari, Montenegro, by the Austrian fleet, in which a number of lives were lost. An item of interest concerning naval affairs was the change in the command of the British fleet in the North Sea, Sir John Jellicoe being promoted to admiral and relieved by Sir Hedworth Pomeroy-Leigh, formerly in command at Portsmouth, who was appointed to the North Sea fleet. This change is said to have excited considerable comment.

General Joffre has also made another sweeping set of changes in the French army in the higher commands, and many of the younger men in the army have been advanced to brigadier and major-generalships as a result.

During the week there has been surprisingly little movement of consequence in the western battle line. On the eastern end in Alsace, only one skirmish of importance has taken place, which was an unsuccessful attempt by the Germans to cut the French lines of communication between St. Amine and Belfort. In the Vosges and thence westward towards Nancy, the Germans made a gain of several miles on a front of ten or twelve miles.

Around Verdun and in the Argonne the fighting on the whole during the week was unusually mild in character, and as a result there has been little change in position. Farther west, in Champagne, the French continued to gain ground in the vicinity of Perthes, and here occurred the heaviest fighting of the week, with heavy losses to both sides. For some four or five weeks the French have been hammering at the German lines in this vicinity and have made sustained and continuous advances, the object being to make the German position in the Argonne, a little to the westward, untenable. Rheims has been severely bombarded again during the week, and both the loss of life and the material damage resulting are said to have been severe.

Near Arras, as a result of a fierce German attack, the French fell back for nearly a mile, losing quite heavily in proportion to the forces engaged both in killed and in prisoners. On the extreme western end of the line, the Belgians gained and held some ground. Looked at broadly, the result of the week's fighting is practically nil.

Great Britain has not greatly increased her forces in France, in spite of the reports in the daily press to the contrary. The reason for this is that she has another movement in mind as a possibility, which depends on how efficacious the 15-inch guns now being tried in the Dardanelles for the first time by warship, may prove to be. This is creating some unrest in France among the people, who of course do not know what is in the wind. This subject will be again referred to next week.

The campaign in Galicia has not been productive of any results during the past week, although the fighting there has been most severe. The Russians, who have been largely reinforced and who now number probably 1,600,000, have been making desperate efforts to drive back the Austrians from the ground recently regained by them, but the Austrian line has held, and even in one or two places advanced slightly. The Russians are still everywhere to the north of the Carpathians, and their tremendous efforts to force the Austrians back into the passes have been uniformly repulsed. In eastern Galicia, the fighting has been particularly severe between Halicz on the Dniester and Stanislaw, and here the Austrians have also held their ground. In Bukowina, the Russians have begun a bombardment of Czernowitz, which has resulted so far in nothing.

In Poland, south of the Vistula, the week has been very quiet, and nothing of importance has taken place. North of the Vistula, the Germans can very near meeting with a serious disaster at Przasnysz, which place it will be remembered they took last week. One army corps advanced too far from the main line and was surrounded by the Russians in superior force, but finally managed to cut its way through the Russian ring and escape. This involved the recapture of the town of Przasnysz by the Russians, and a retreat by this portion of the German line.

Otherwise the positions are much as they were last week. The Germans are besieging the important Russian fortress of Ossowitz, and are devoting the most of their energies to its capture. Reports reach us that two of the seven detached forts surrounding the main fort have been reduced and that the indications are that the place will be taken before very long. The Russians are making attack after attack on the German lines here with the object of stopping the siege.

There has also been some severe fighting near Lomza and northwest of Grodno, as well as to the defensive purposes within gun range of harbors and shall be constructed so as to be harmless away from their anchorages. It also suggests that submarines shall not attack merchant shipping, and that neutral flags shall not be employed to conceal nationality.

Needless to say, this note addressed to both powers received the most serious attention abroad. One notable result has been the practical suspension by Germany of her submarine blockade of Great Britain, pending formal action by the Allies upon the President's note. In fact, as early as March 3 the press contained the German reply to this note in substance accepting the President's suggestions. As to the use of mines, Germany thinks it not practicable fully to renounce the employment of anchored mines for offensive purposes. It agrees to restricted use of submarines on condition that hostile mercantile vessels shall not be armed nor hide their identity by neutral flags or signs. It offers to enter into the suggested regulation of foodstuff shipments so as to insure their treatment as non-contraband, but insists that other raw materials for peaceful economic purposes shall be included. The offer of co-operation by the German Government is declared in the note to be tentative, pending the announcement of the attitude of the Allies on the subject.

Just prior to the reception of the German answer, the reply of the Allies to the German naval war zone proclamation was announced in the House of Commons by Premier Asquith, who at the same time stated that the policy then announced was not to be construed as a rejection of the latest representations of the United States, which were still under careful consideration.

The substance of the Allies' reply to the German declaration of a war area about Great Britain is, that such a move by Germany is contrary to the law and customs of nations in as far as it includes attacks on commerce; the whole responsibility of such attacks is placed upon the enemy; the submarine is declared incapable, because of its character, of conforming to the recognized rules of law governing the treatment of enemy merchant vessels; and England declares that she will adopt retaliatory measures in order to prevent commodities of any kind from reaching or leaving Germany, but in strict observance of the dictates of humanity.

It does not appear that Washington is inclined to be satisfied with the course of events, but remains hopeful that the Allies will arrive at an early decision upon the President's note of February 22 in harmony with the attitude of Germany. Meanwhile, so far as reports show, there is a practical suspension of the German submarine "blockade," in all probability in order to open the way for an adjustment of this international question to the satisfaction of all concerned. Shipping has not, however, resumed its normal status.

The stumbling block to an adjustment on the basis of the American suggestions, appears to be the German requirement that raw materials, including fodder, intended for peaceful purposes shall be exempt from interference on the high seas. Such commodities include cotton, wool and other materials of the textile industries; oil and seeds; rubber and resins; hides and bones; fertilizers, including nitrates and phosphates; metallic ores; glass, lime, bricks; china and glassware; paper and paper-making materials; soaps and paints; ammonia, sulphate of copper and similar substances.

The entire subject of contraband goods in time of war is a delicate one, and a readjustment at the present time is looked upon as doubtful. The hope is that by concessions on both sides, foodstuffs and some other essentials to life, intended for non-combatants shall be held entirely exempt from interference by belligerents in the present war. The joint resolution passed by Congress, seemingly giving the President increased power over shipments of munitions of war, does not affect the situation.

The Dardanelles—Ancient Hellespont—45 miles long, 1 to 5 miles wide. The Sea of Marmora is 175 miles in length, 50 miles wide, and contains many small islands. The Bosphorus is 17 miles long, 1 to 2 miles wide.

east of Augustowo and Suwalki, but without change of moment.

EDITORIAL NOTE. As mentioned last week, President Wilson on February 22 addressed an identical note to the English and German Governments on the subject of neutral commerce menaced by the establishment of the naval war zone around Great Britain by Germany, and by the use of the American flag to protect neutral vessels.

The exact representations in this new note have been kept a secret, but in a general way it is understood that the President sought to secure between Germany and England an agreement that, in consideration of the withdrawal by Germany of her naval war zone announcement, England would permit vessels carrying foodstuffs destined for the civilian population of her enemies to proceed to their ports. The President's note, which is not a formal proposal but solely a friendly effort to serve the interests of humanity, suggests that drifting mines shall not be laid by either belligerent, that anchored mines shall be used exclusively for de-

THE SUPREME INSPIRATION

A SERMON BY REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, D.D.*

"Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead." II Tim. 2: 8, R.V.

THESE words are found in the last writing of Paul preserved for us. When he wrote them he was in prison and facing death. He was charged with crime; mark the significance of his own words, "In bonds as a malefactor." What the charge was specifically we are not told. Different conjectures have been made: that he was arrested and imprisoned on a charge of sedition, on a charge of having complicity in the burning of Rome, on a charge of treason. Most probably it was this latter charge of treason, which was preferred against him on the ground of his preaching of the kingdom of God and of the kingdom of Jesus. In Thessalonica they charged him with acting "contrary to the decrees of Cæsar, saying that there is another King, one Jesus." His trial had two stages. The first was over when he wrote this letter. In it he had been deserted. Listen to his pathetic words, "At my first defense no one took my part, but all forsook me." He seems to have expected some delay before the second stage of the trial, for he urged Timothy to hasten to him, bringing Mark with him, charging him also to bring a cloak, a suggestive revelation of his physical suffering in the chilliness of the dungeon, and also some precious parchments. The probability is that there was not the delay he expected, and that Timothy never saw him again alive. Mark it well: in those days of loneliness, in the grip of hostile world-power, forsaken by his friends, suffering the chill of the dungeon, and anticipating the end, he wrote, "Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, of the seed of David."

Timothy almost certainly received this letter in Ephesus. The first letter was sent to him there, and the probability is that he remained there having the care of the churches. Tradition has it that he was martyred in Ephesus. Ephesus was the capital of Proconsular Asia. It was the child of Athens with its culture, and Asiatic paganism; a strange mixture. It was the center of the worship of Artemis or Diana; and it was also a commercial center. Wealthy, superstitious and corrupt, it was a place of grave peril to the infant church. The man in oversight of that church held a position of peculiar responsibility and subtle peril. The struggle against almost overwhelming odds must have been fierce, and to that man in those circumstances these words came: "Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, of the seed of David."

Let us then consider these words in the simplest way; observing in turn, first, the meaning of the injunction; secondly, the reason of its giving; and thirdly, how it may be practiced, and what is the value of such practice.

"Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead." In the Authorized Version the text reads thus: "Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead." When we put the two versions together we recognize the fact that they both say the same thing in different ways. Central, to our thinking of him, we must keep this fact, "Risen from the dead." Necessarily that involves the actuality of his death. It has been asserted that he never really died, but swooned, and was resuscitated. The actual Man of our humanity did most actually die, but we are to remember him as risen from the dead, not "raised from the dead," but "risen from the dead." The apostle was fixing attention not upon the act, but upon the fact. Paul said in effect: Let your last thought about Jesus Christ, and your perpetual remembrance of him, fasten him upon your mind as alive, though having been dead. That is Paul's more logical way of saying that which John said more poetically, quoting the words of Jesus as he heard them in the isle washed by the sea, "I am the first and the last, and the Living One; and I was dead, and behold, I am alive for evermore!" "Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, of the seed of David."

Having realized the importance of the central note of the injunction we may fasten our attention upon the Person. Necessarily we think of more than the resurrection, but in the process of remembering Jesus Christ, we shall qualify everything by the final act of resurrection. So let us think of him; of his person; of his teaching; of his cross.

Think of his person. John, the apostle of love, said concerning Jesus: "We beheld his glory, glory as of the only begotten from the Father, full of grace and truth." "Remember Jesus Christ"; and in so doing we think of incarnate grace and truth. There are no better words than these, and if for a moment I borrow other words it is only that we may catch some of the splendors focused within them. "Remember Jesus Christ," and remembering the person of Jesus Christ, we remember sweetness and strength; light and love; justice and compassion; righteousness and mercy; the merging in a personality of those qualities and quantities which sometimes seem to be in antagonism, but when perfectly blended are seen to present the true man. "Remember Jesus Christ." Yes, but he was murdered; those hands that were ever doing good were nailed to the cross; those feet that were ever hurrying upon errands of mercy were transfixed with brutal and bloody nails; he was mauled, spit upon, done to death! I remember him! Then remember him risen! Grace and truth cannot be finally crucified, it must rise again. All the high things that make humanity beautiful cannot forever be laid in the dust spattered with blood. "Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead."

For the Joy That Was Set Before Him

Remember him again in order to listen to his teaching. How shall I summarize the teaching of Jesus? I will do it by the use of three words: righteousness, peace, joy. I wonder if I have put them in the right order. It is the apostolic order; yet listen to the teaching of Jesus; remember the keynote of his great Manifesto, the first note. Presently as you read the Manifesto through, you hear the deep and awful tones of stern denunciation, and you hear again and again the infinite music of perfect tenderness, each marvelous strain blending and merging into the ultimate and final harmony; but the first note of the Sermon on the Mount is happy! "Blessed" as we read it, but it is far more accurately, happy! Before he is through with that great ethical enunciation he will make you shake and tremble and shiver with fear, if you are a man at all. He will probe the innermost recesses of your soul, and bring to bear upon the secret things of your life the white light of the eternal throne; but the keynote is Happy. That is the ultimate purpose, but happiness must be based upon righteousness. So he went about teaching.

Have you ever taken time to write out for yourselves all the words of Jesus? Having written them, read them through, just for once forgetting the context and the occasion on which they were spoken. Read them again and again, and ponder them, and you will find three notes running through them: righteousness, peace, joy. Yes, but they silenced him; they buffeted the mouth that had uttered the words; they murdered him, so that the dear lips could say nothing else. "Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead!" You may for a while silence the voice, but you cannot silence the Word of the living God. After the drear, deep, dense darkness of those days and nights in which the world and heaven were without Christ, his body in the grave, his spirit descending to hades, behold him risen! Now he will speak, not with one human mouth, but with twelve, with five hundred, with ten thousand; until today the speech of the risen Son of God is being proclaimed by all the sacramental host who are born again of his Holy Spirit. "Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead."

When I remember his person, I see him murdered. When I remember his teaching, I find his voice silenced, so that the central, awful, appalling thing I remember is the Cross. Dare to look at it, dare to face it! Here is one perfect example of humanity, of beauty, of strength, of tenderness, of compassion, of clarity of intellect, of marvel of emotion, of balance of volition; dead at the hands of lawless men. Where is God? You have never seen the Cross if you have never been driven to ask that question. When modern philosophers take the resurrection away from me, and leave me only the Cross of such a Man as this, they leave me an infidel in revolt against God, declining, therefore, to believe that there is a God, or if there is, that he is good. The Cross alone is the place where all hope goes out in hellish darkness; and all faith is eclipsed forever. You tell me the Cross is vulgar! So it is, and with a vulgarity too terrific for words; the vulgarity that mauls and puts to death the most beautiful things the world has ever seen.

Let us now go further and inquire why Paul charged Timothy to "Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead." Timothy had been ordained to a life and service which were extremely difficult. There are two notes in this letter which are of supreme importance. The first is: Be not ashamed of me, and be not ashamed of the Gospel. The other is: Suffer hardship. You may express it in the old way, No cross, no crown; No pains, no gains. It is true of the soldier, the athlete, the husbandman. Did you ever understand this verse so well as you understand today? "No soldier on service entangleth himself in the affairs of this life!" That does not mean that the soldier will not waste time playing; it means that nearer and dearer to the soldier is the cross of duty, than mother, wife, sweetheart, child. No cross, no crown! No pains, no gains! The athlete must contend lawfully. Again it is the same principle. No cross, no crown! No pains, no gains! No sloughing off of things unnecessary, no resting upon the forces of the physical and mental; then no crowning, no garland, no winning! Wonderful of all, and I do not say that carefully, the husbandman laboreth. We must read into word laboreth all its significance. The Greek word means the toil which reduces strength, the toil that brings fatigue, the work that brings the weariness which is the touch of death. The man away from the country today who plows and watches his laboring; putting down into the dear old earth her own vitality and strength, and if he does not, then there will be no reaping of the harvest, and no golden fruitage.

Paul said in effect to Timothy, the young evangelist, called to the Christian service and ministry: You are called to a service and ministry so difficult that you will need the quality of the soldier with its touch of heroism, the severance of everything that binds to this life; the quality of the athlete with the careful training which refuses the things that hinder and contends lawfully; the toil, the labor, the fatigue of the husbandman. Who is sufficient for these things? Where is there sufficient inspiration to enable a man so to serve, so to live? Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead."

He Ever Liveth

So we pass to the final word, the injunction itself. How can we remember Jesus Christ risen? The word "remembrance" is very accurate and beautiful; yet unless we are careful we may misinterpret its meaning. Strictly the word does not mean remembrance, re-collection; it means fixity, having in mind, keeping it there. The memory is not referred to as something which works spasmodically; but as a faculty of the soul which is charged for evermore with this wonderful image of the risen Christ. How can that be? Be in mind the memory is not moral, it is not immoral, it is non-moral. Memory has no relation to the right or wrong of a thing. You tell me it is easy to remember an evil thing than a good thing. No, it is not; that is your fault, the result of being on a low level on which you have trained your mind! There is no such thing as a cultured memory. Memory is memory automatic, self-acting. As Prof. James once said, "Never forget, memory does not act by itself." If I say to you, "Remember," you will say, "What?" Memory will be of no use till I tell you what to remember. It is well to have these things in mind, for by doing so we shall get rid of a good deal of false thinking about memory.

The basis of memory is knowledge. You cannot remember anything you do not know. It is philosophic. The activity of memory is thought. You have to think upon the thing you know, to set your mind on it. Finally, it is pragmatic, that is practical. There must be application of the thing you know or memory will become atrophied, paralyzed. I will take three other words. The activity of memory may be defined thus: association, imagination, inspiration. We must know Jesus Christ risen from the dead. That is the basis of association. Then we must think upon Jesus Christ risen from the dead, and that imaginatively and not merely logically, allowing our imagination to work and have full play. Finally let association interpreted by imagination become inspiration. That is to remember Jesus Christ.

Mark the value of that exercise. Put it in another way. I will borrow from another New Testament writing, probably by the same man: "Consider me

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D.,

The Waste of Christian Influence

SUNDAY, March 21. Psalm 107: 2. "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so." It is their duty. The man who has been blessed is in duty bound to become a witness. The enriched disciple must become a busy apostle. He who has heard the word of life must himself become a messenger. "Let him that heareth say, Come." Experiences must record themselves in expression. The world is waiting for witnesses, and especially for witnesses of the lay and unofficial order. The witness of the regular ministry is partly discounted because of our calling. Our testimony is expected, and it is thereby deprived of the element of surprise. But when a business man witnesses to the power of redeeming grace the testimony runs with arresting strength. It is this kind of witness who captures the interest of the jury and wins their verdict. The world, I say, is waiting for lay witnesses, and too often their testimony is hid like a lamp put under a bushel. "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so!" It is their duty to add the power of their experience to the record of redeeming grace.

But it is also their sacred interest. Experiences which are denied expression speedily fade away. Expression confirms experience, it sustains it and enriches it. Sentiments which find no voice find it hard to live. Gratitude which never says "Thank you" pines away in its silence. Expression gives air to sentiments, and quickens and strengthens them. It is ever so with a truth of revelation. We confess our hold upon a truth when we become its witness. Many doubts melt away like mist when our souls go into the open air of public testimony. Who the disciple of truth becomes its apostle it cloths itself in more radiant glory. And so do I say, is our interest to declare what the Lord hath done for our souls.

"I shall be my witnesses!" That was our Lord's command. The world is waiting for our obedience. J. H. J.

The Tearless Faces of Heaven

MONDAY, March 22. Isaiah 25: 1-12. "He will destroy . . . the veil spread over all nations." Note the connection between this radiant anticipation of the rending of the veil, with the wiping away of all tears: "The Lord God will wipe away tear from off all faces." It would appear that there can never be a face without its tears. We have seen them on the pure, sweet faces of the children, and on the wrinkled faces of the aged. They have been set flowing by many causes, but especially because of the fact of the covering that is cast over all peoples and the veil that is spread over all nations. There is so much in our life which is veiled, as the mountains by morning-mists. If only we could see the meaning of life's discipline, the ultimate certain accomplishment of all that we have developed for, the reunion of sundered hearts and lives; we could at least smile through our tears, and perhaps we should shed none.

But surely that veil is becoming every year thinner! Already the empire of the spiritual is beginning to assert itself, as when the light of a radiant summer morning steals in on a brilliantly lighted hall. The presence of our Lord is near to be revealed. He has always been with us, but our eyes have been holden that we should not see him. The veil which conceals the spirit-world is thinning away every hour. The light behind is becoming more intense. It cannot be long before those who over the manifested glory will see it. And it shall be said in that day, Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him; we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation. Then as we see eye to eye, all mysteries solved, all separation ended, all hearts satisfied—tear will be wiped away forever. F. B. M.

Attempt Great Things with God as Ally

TUESDAY, March 23. Luke 1: 32. "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Most High; and the Lord shall give unto him the throne of his father David." Who does not want to be great in his particular realm? Try to think of the men who have tried to make their names mortal. The Greek Phidias carved his name on the shield of Minerva, and thought thus to make his name immortal; but the world cares little for Phidias today.

When visiting Egypt, I saw a great pile of ruins on the bank of the Nile, said to be the remains of a vast pyramid, erected by an Egyptian king at the expense of thousands of men's lives of toil. But I found no one who could even tell me the name of the ruler, who had failed to perpetuate his own memory.

The angel said to Mary concerning Jesus, "He shall be great," and this Peasant of Galilee, who built no monuments, wrote no books, marshaled no armies, is today the greatest figure in history.

Have you ever attempted to do, by the help of God, things that you could not do alone?

Phillips Brooks once said, "Pray for powers to fit your tasks, not for tasks to fit your power." Do not fear to attempt great things with God. Your extremity will prove to be God's opportunity.

Jesus acted upon the principle, "Not my will, but thine be done." He said, "I do always the things that please him." The Christian must always keep in mind, "What does God want me to do?" God has a private and particular will for each one of us, different from that for any other individual in the world, and in accordance with our own particular temperament, education and environment. To find this will and to follow it makes the humblest man great. C. S. C.

Bringing Heaven Into Our Daily Lives

WEDNESDAY, March 24. John 5: 19-29. "The Father loveth the Son, and showeth him all things that himself doeth." These words of our Lord were spoken of his relation to the Father during the period of his earthly and mediatorial ministry. They explain what was involved in his self-emptying on our behalf. He laid aside his participation in equality with God that he might know our human life, set us an example and link us with the eternal God. The spirit of his Sonship has been breathed into our hearts also; so that what was true of him, when he lived on earth, is also true of us, and is the more deeply true of us as we are more profoundly animated and inspired by his Spirit. Let us therefore appropriate these words.

The Father loves us. Whatever parental love stands for in our experience exists between God and us, carried to the millionth degree of patience, tenderness and resource. And if we will only walk with him, and give him time, he will show us what he is doing. "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets." "And the Lord said, 'Shall I hide from Abraham that which I do? . . . For I have known him to the end that he may command his children after him.'" "Even as Moses was warned of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: See, saith he, that thou makest all things according to the pattern that was shewed thee in the mount." We learn from these words that our Lord's human life was fashioned by his vision of eternal realities. He translated into that material what he saw in the spiritual. What he saw in the spiritual he transferred to the material and physical. His life was a copy of things in the heavens. Why should not ours be? But if so, we must watch the unfoldings of God's plans, and we must not be disobedient to the heavenly vision. F. B. M.

Carry Your Cross with a Smiling Face

THURSDAY, March 25. Luke 14: 27. "Whoever doth not bear his own cross and come after me cannot be my disciple." Everybody has a cross, and in this respect everybody is like Jesus. The difference between men is the difference of their attitude toward their crosses and their obstacles. The successful Christian is the one who has the right point of view toward obstacles, who recognizes that the taking up of his cross and bearing it bravely as Christ did means success.

It may be a lack of education; it may be a fierce besetting sin; or it may be poverty, or ill health, or the loss of friends and home. Everyone has one or more of these crosses, and the heart that can bear its burden with a smiling face, and trust God through shadow as through light, is the standing example of the Christian. He is the man who helps.

Napoleon said, "Obstacles are just things to be overcome." What is your attitude toward your obstacle?

Did you tackle the trouble that came your way
With a resolute heart and cheerful?
Or hide your face from the light of day
With a craven heart and fearful?
Oh, a trouble's a ton or a trouble's an ounce.

Or a trouble is what you make it;
And it isn't the fact that you're hurt that counts,
But only how did you take it?

You're beaten to earth? Well, well, what's that?
Come up with a smiling face;
It's nothing against you to fall down flat,
But to lie there—that's disgrace!
The harder you're thrown, why, the higher you bounce;
Be proud of your blackened eye.
It isn't the fact that you're licked that counts,
It's how did you fight, and why?

And though you be done to death, what then?
If you battled the best you could;
If you played your part in the world of men,
Why, the Critic will call it good.
Death comes with a crawl, or comes with a pounce,
And whether he's slow or spry,
It isn't the fact that you're dead that counts,
But only, how did you die?

Today let me keep in mind that nothing is too hard for God. C. S. C.

Faith the Christian's Trusty Shield

FRIDAY, March 26. Ephesians 6: 14-23. "Able to quench all the fiery darts of the evil one." We must not be astonished at the shower of fiery darts that are dropped on us, or flung at us, like the rain of iron bullets on the battlefield, or the dropping of bombs on a sleeping town. The devil's weapon is a lie. He insinuates the suggestion that this or the other is not wrong, or at least not wrong for you; or, if he admits that the thing is wrong, yet the dart is fire-tipped with an appeal to passion in the hope that it may ignite some magazine of impetuous desire, causing it to explode. We need some means of quenching the fire-dart. The missile must be plunged into water and allowed to explode or fizzle out there.

Paul had had many an encounter with the prince of the power of the air and his subordinates, and speaks from his personal experience when he tells us that all the fiery darts of the evil one are quenched on the shield of faith. By faith we climb into the world of spirit and obtain thence supernatural power, which is stored in the nature of Jesus. By faith we enter into the pure and holy atmosphere of heaven, in which evil is not to be found, and therefore the atmosphere forbids the ignition of the soul. By faith we hide ourselves in Christ, and are covered by his protecting wing, putting his grace and peace between us and evil. Then we can say with him, "The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me." We are fighting in the dark, and this makes the fiery darts seem more terrible; but it is in the dark that we learn to trust; and we know that if we watch unto prayer we must be heard. The answer will be given. Not one prayer will drop into the sea and be lost as a wearied carrier-pigeon. In the hour when the murky air is the thickest and the attack hottest, Christ's revelation of himself as Love and Power will be our safeguard. F. B. M.

The Homelessness of Jesus

SATURDAY, March 27. John 8: 1. "Jesus went unto the Mount of Olives." He who was born in a manger because there was no room in the inn, who fled into Egypt because his own nation sought his life, who passed his boyhood in despised Nazareth, began the work of his life without a home, a city or a country that desired him; he who found an occasional resting place among friends in Capernaum, Bethany and Jerusalem, once said, "The foxes have holes, the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head." He who was rich became poor that we, through his poverty, might become rich.

Bread and fish was his diet; he slept in boats, in deserts, on hillsides. His disciples and the people who followed him were poor. The world's Christ was rocked in a borrowed cradle, buried in a borrowed grave. The robe he wore, the only memento he could have left his mother, was raffled for by his crucifiers. He gave his body, his life, his blood, himself, for the salvation of mankind. Christ was rich in creative and redemptive power, in love, mercy and compassion, and we are the heirs to the infinite legacy of his wealth. Though Jesus lived like a beggar, he was a king in disguise, on a visit to save a race. Now he is the Chief, the One altogether lovely among the inhabitants of immortality, as well as the Judge upon the throne of the universe. E. W. C.

THE FILIPINO HORSE MIGHT ALSO SERVE IN FAMINE

OUR FILIPINO WARDS

BY FRANK L. BROWN

Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

A BRIDGE FOR ONE-WAY TRAVEL ONLY

THE booming of Admiral Dewey's guns in Manila Harbor sounded a new day for the brown-skinned boys and girls of the Philippines. Little did they dream that Uncle Sam had come to liberate their minds and bodies, yes, and their very souls, by bringing education and the freedom of religious worship.

Within a few years of America's possession of the Philippines six hundred thousand bright Filipino boys and girls were found in schoolhouses scattered all over the islands studying modern textbooks illustrated from Philippine life. Fifteen hundred American school teachers had come over ten thousand miles to the debilitating climate of the islands, to enable these boys and girls to know the facts of history, the wonders of life, the secrets of healthful living.

Then these young people told the story to their parents, who had never been educated under the Spanish régime. In fact, to be educated was the privilege only of the estrado or upper classes. And these Filipino children told their parents they must open the windows of their nipa (straw-thatched) huts at night and let in the fresh air; and that it was not sanitary for each member of the family in turn to smoke the long black family cigar which was suspended from the ceiling. They told them, too, that water must be boiled to prevent the spread of typhoid, which had steadily decimated the population.

But superstitions yield slowly, and the American rule was not welcomed heartily, and many of these new reforms must wait until the children of today become the parents and teachers of tomorrow.

Has it been good to give these people education? To be sure, the result at first, as with our own negroes, was to make them heady and to spoil them for labor on the farm or in the village, for the educated Spanish never worked. But the hard necessities of living gradually corrected this. And the Americans introduced manual instruction, and the Filipino youth were taught to be carpenters, to make fine furniture from their beautiful native woods, to weave and to knit. The industrial exhibit of the provincial schools which I saw at Manila was a wonderful testimony to this increasing skill.

And Uncle Sam did another fine thing for these young people. Baseball was introduced by the American teacher, and these Filipinos, formerly accustomed to spend their time and money in the cockpits which abounded, betting on their favorite roosters, now are in the open playing baseball with an enthusiasm that would almost outdo the Americans of the homeland.

Gradually these educated young Filipinos are becoming school teachers and are entering the government service as clerks. With education has come indifference to the old church of the islands, which demanded too much of their reasonable belief.

Ambitious, music-loving, imitative, amiable, patriotic, these youth face the new day. They must be won for Christ, for the future of these islands is in their hands.

Four years ago the World's Sunday School Association began co-operation with the mission forces in laying strong Sunday school foundations in the islands. It was my privilege to go to the islands with strong letters from President Taft and other leaders. Governor Forbes and Bishop Brent cooperated in addressing a great convention of Sunday school workers from twenty-three provinces. The Philippine Islands Sunday School Union was formed. A Filipino pastor was elected president.

Two years ago Rev. Mr. Williams of Portland made a Sunday school tour of the Philippines for the World's Sunday School Association, to promote the educational work of the Sunday schools. The new slogan calls for a Sunday school membership equal to the church membership, by the World's Sunday School Convention at Tokyo in October, 1916, and that means an increase from 30,000 to over 60,000. Attractive literature is being produced and the boys and girls are being given a chance to know the Book. The Filipino young people in Christian educational schools are being trained for school leadership, and a brighter day is dawning for those who have been bound with superstitions.

So here again we have the old and the new in sharp contrast. The Intramuros, an inner city, is there, where the Spaniards in the old times shut themselves in and away from the diseases that killed off the natives without the walls, with no effort to relieve their condition. An old dungeon still stands, dark, forbidding, a hole where prisoners were kept, hating their oppressors. And near by stands the Bilidid prison where Uncle Sam is training prisoners to be self-respecting citizens through schooling and manual instruction. As I stood under the Stars and Stripes on the platform, the center of the prison enclosure, I saw the prisoners drawn up in the prison yard for their daily exercise. The prison band of sixty pieces played the Star-Spangled Banner, and two thousand prisoners bared their heads and placed their hats on their breasts as the patriotic strains pealed out. I did not wonder when the keeper told me that two of these prisoners came back as second offenders.

In the deep dust of the highway in the town of Mexico north of Manila, I tramped with two thousand others, with bands and gorgeous flags celebrating the tenth anniversary of the introduction of Protestantism in that place. Thousands of faces looked out upon us from the Filipino homes set in palms. In the procession were two remarkable floats. One of them held a representation of a padlocked Bible seven feet by four—to suggest the hundreds of years of a closed Bible under the ecclesiastical order. The other float had the faces of four young men, Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, writing the Gospel in an open book. Behind them was painted a sunrise, prophetic of the new day, with the open Bible for the heart-thirsty people.

CARRYING THE BANNER OF CHRIST AFAR

A JOURNEY IN INDIA

IT WAS my privilege to get away from Ceylon for a while to the broader plains of India, and see how the empire world there was getting on—the world—the old world—the world that has changed little for decades of centuries—the world that is the wonder of the world because it has not changed. The patient, toiling, plodding peasant still makes it the storehouse of the world, the same as it was in Alexander's time, and it is still coveted by greedy nations the same as it has been ever since that time.

Taliemannar! Dhanuskodi! Rammswarami Mandapami—connecting the Indian side of the new railway across—away from the raids of the Emden. We have not yet got to the time when there shall be no more sea, but so far as the human efforts of finite man go, they are reducing that element materially in those places where it is not wanted.

Railway accommodations and attendance in India are very good, and the line is so smooth, as compared to Ceylon, that one hardly seems to be moving. A number of Indian gentlemen from Calcutta and Northern India were traveling with us. They had only landed that day from South Africa and the last that they heard of the war was being bombarded.

The represented authorities asked me on entering India, "What is your caste?" "Caste," said I; "I have no caste." But they insisted, so I had to give in, and as I really hadn't any, I replied that according to international law I must be a Vellala, as my husband was such. So they put me down as a Vellala, with a smile, and that evaded my being taken for a spy that time. But I was examined at every junction all the way to Madras.

In Madras—the city of dirt and magnificence—the mass of Indian life goes on as it would go on if there were no war. The horizon is too narrow to admit of anything very far off. Life is too strenuous, and today is too dear—poor Indian!

And now we are away up here in Central India. I rather believe the conservative Mahrattas have more to say on the subject, but what they think we do not know; and one can only look at matters all around and discriminate. The opium-eating laborers are in no wise likely to set the North River on fire, and the Brahmans, of whom there is a great preponderance, are at present not fighters, so the worst that has happened is that the price of cotton is lower, and they are thinking of putting in some other crops next year.

The climate is cool and pleasant, twenty degrees from the equator, and the vast population of the plains of India are far more open to thoughts of religion than to thoughts of war.

(MRS.) KITTIE WOOD KUMARAKU-LASINCHE, Newara Eliya, Ceylon.

PIONEER WORK IN CENTRAL AFRICA

THE joy of preaching the Gospel of Christ to those who hear it for the first time is rarely experienced by the pastor or evangelist in this country. This joy falls to the lot of the missionary who explores those districts of Africa where the Christian messenger has never been. Such has been the recent experience of Rev. A. J. Liebenberg and Rev. A. G. Murray of the Nyasaland Mission of Central Africa. It was found necessary to visit the governor general at Tete, on account of Roman Catholic opposition, and so these missionaries made the journey south of the stations in Nyasaland to Portuguese East Africa, covering a distance of 1,000 miles. The journey, by foot and on the backs of donkeys, was filled with new and remarkable experiences, together with many hardships. On one occasion they were without water for two days, except for some muddy, coffee-colored liquid which they found in small quantities by digging holes in the sand of a dried-up river. Afterwards they found plenty of good water on the Chiuta Mountains. There they also found a beautiful plantation, owned by a half-Portuguese, named Farnandi, where pineapples, oranges, bananas, lemons and other fruits, besides vegetables and rubber, are grown for export.

Mr. Liebenberg writes: "This country has been in the hands of the Portuguese since 1632, and today when I had services in this village of Chiuta, where Farnandi's cattle kraal is, this half-Portuguese said to me, 'I never heard a white man yet I met about God.' He cannot read, and never heard the Gospel. This whole country is in absolute darkness. We must do something! If I remember rightly Livingstone first visited Tete in 1856, and we are blaming the Portuguese for not doing anything for these thousands since 1856. What have we as missionaries done? Farnandi is seventy years old.

"I saw very strange things during these two months, and visited villages of nearly 80,000 people. I preached to many every day along the road and found that the Gospel had never been preached in any of the villages where we stayed at night. One thing that made my heart glad was that almost anywhere the people could understand me."

The Nyasaland Mission began work on the shores of Lake Nyasa, twenty-five years ago, under the direction of the Dutch Reformed Church of South Africa, the only native church organization in that great continent. Dr. Andrew Murray, now eighty-seven years old, was then the principal leader in the movement. There are today about 2,000 native evangelists, laboring in 332 out-stations, under the supervision of seventy-two European missionaries in eighteen cent

A HEROINE OF ANTWERP

BY MAUD HARRISON

AN ENGLISH trained nurse was on her midsummer holidays in Antwerp, Belgium. She had left home thoroughly tired out after a very hard spring and winter of most constant employment.

One day as she was walking along the streets on her way to the cathedral, enjoying her every surrounding and thinking that she would be quite content to spend the rest of her life in this old Antwerp, a newsboy rushed past her with an armload of newspapers. The little fellow was calling at the very top of his lungs: "War! war! war! The Germans are coming!"

The nurse was startled. Could it really be true that war had really come and that Belgium, perhaps the beautiful city she was in, was to be invaded, maybe destroyed? She hoped it could not be as bad as all that. At any rate, the mobilization of troops took time, and she thought nothing serious could happen in the next few days and then her holidays would be over and she would return to peaceful England.

Finally the day for her return arrived, but events had developed so quickly it was quite impossible for her to get home. There was nothing for her to do but stay where she was until the tide of the German army turned in other directions, and a safe passage was open to the coast for the non-combatants.

It is in just such crises as this when confronted Mrs. John Scott that we become heroic—some of us.

Returning sadly from the British consulate, where she had gone to see if anything could be done towards her departure, Mrs. Scott met wagons and ambulances coming into the city from the country, loaded with wounded soldiers. They were piled in indiscriminately together, Germans and Belgians alike. The majority were very young men, many mere boys. Instantly her mother-love was aroused by the pitiful sight.

In England Mrs. Scott had been known as a surgical nurse. This time, she confined her work to the care of patients recovering from broken bones and operations. She had already had considerable experience in the nursing of victims of gunshot wounds, in her words, just the training most suitable for an army nurse, having assisted at many operations, and watched carefully the surgeons at work.

Even if she was not of their nationality, the thought of what she could do that would be most helpful to these brave soldier boys continued to agitate her mind. Why not, as she must stay in the country, open a private hospital and give to the younger men a real mother's care and nursing, something quite impossible in the overcrowded big city and Red Cross hospitals?

The burgomaster, a kind, middle-aged Belgian, received her proposition with enthusiasm. "Madame," he said,

"God has sent you to us. Our hospitals are overcrowded with the wounded, we are at a loss to know what to do with many of the poor fellows who are being brought in from the front."

"But I can think," said the burgomaster, in some perplexity, "of no place the city can offer you, except perhaps one of our schools."

"The very thing!" replied Mrs. Scott. So a schoolhouse was selected for the work, and desks and other furniture removed. Then Mrs. Scott, as help was hard to obtain, got down on her hands and knees and washed the floors with an antiseptic solution. Next she treated the walls in the same manner. While at this work the magnitude of the task she was undertaking, unaided, almost overcame her, and she was on the point of giving up, but the pitiful picture of the ambulances and wagons, loaded with the wounded and suffering, came to her mind and she felt ashamed of her weakness when there hospital work, had much more than they could do, and it was quite impossible for them to promise to undertake any more.

What could she do? The answer came quickly. The work itself: run a hospital, nurse and mother the sick, set broken bones, remove bullets and other foreign matter from wounds, perhaps perform other operations. In short, surgeon, nurse and the whole hospital corps.

The strength was given her. In a little room off her main ward she fitted up, with the help of her aged carpenter, an operating cabinet. A was so much work to be done immediately.

"IN SHORT, SURGEON, NURSE AND THE WHOLE HOSPITAL CORPS"

The room put in a sanitary condition, the next thing was to furnish it. Hospital beds, even cots, were unobtainable. So the assistance of an aged carpenter was procured. A number of strong wooden bunks were built along the sides of the rooms. With the help of the burgomaster Mrs. Scott managed to get mattresses and bed clothing, as well as necessary surgical supplies and instruments. Now her medical staff had to be established. But investigation soon proved that practically the only doctors left in the city, between private practice and tiny kitchen was also equipped. Then with much difficulty the burgomaster found her a male helper, a strong young man, who had lost his job in a restaurant, and who was able to do the cooking for the sick and help lift the patients and care for them.

In a surprisingly short space of time she was ready to begin her work. There was no lack of patients from the moment the doors were opened. She performed all operations, many of them most difficult ones, with success. Then, when the poor fellows were patched together and laid in their beds to get well, she nursed them night and day with a mother's care.

MRS. SCOTT AMONG HER CONVALESCENTS AND HELPERS

As the work progressed good women of the city became interested in it, and contributed money, bandages and surgical supplies and home-made dainties. Several also volunteered as assistant nurses, and worked with a will.

Mrs. Scott wrote long letters for the patients to the old folks at home, and tender love letters to sweethearts. She cheered her boys when they were down-hearted, and made them good things to eat just as mothers would. When they became convalescent, she devised amusements for them, and found them good books to read.

There was a splendid spirit of camaraderie in the little hospital. Every one wanted to help! Just as soon as a patient was able to be around, he always insisted on doing something for those who were not as well off. National differences caused by the war were forgotten for the moment, and German and Belgian patients fraternized like brothers.

When the Germans besieged Antwerp Mrs. Scott's hospital was so crowded with desperately wounded patients that many were obliged to sleep on mattresses on the floor. When the city surrendered, her Flemish help and all her Belgian patients who were even able to crawl fled. Still the hospital was left crowded with soldiers too ill to move. If Mrs. Scott thought of flight, which was doubtful, a look at these patients was enough for her to make up her mind to remain. Shortly after the Germans had taken possession of the city she presented herself to the military governor and in a few brief words told him the story of her hospital, how she had cared for many wounded German soldiers, and wished to continue her work, but desired to preserve the neutrality of her efforts. The bluff soldier asked her many questions and seemed greatly interested. Finally he said to her:

"Madam, as you are fully aware, your country and mine are at war, but between you personally and the German forces under me in Antwerp I declare a truce. You are free to go or stay as you will. From this moment your hospital shall be regarded by us as neutral territory, and if any of my soldiers invade it or bother you in any way, you have only to report the matter to me, and I will see they receive severe punishment. If you need help, money, food, medical supplies, call upon me and they will be supplied. Madam, I have the honor to wish you good morning, and—may God bless you!"

AMONG THE WORKERS

—REV. J. R. WALKER, M. E. Church, Edgefield, S. C., writes that at a union service at Trion, S. C., it was voted to petition the President and Congress to use their influence, as far as practicable, in advancing the cause of world peace and world federation.

—EVANGELIST EDWIN S. STUCKER conducted services with the Federated church in Marion, Kan. in February, and goes in March to Kansas City, Kan. This will be his twenty-eighth meeting in Kansas, where he is also much interested in Chautauqua work, being secretary of the second oldest Chautauqua in the world, at Lawrence, Kan., and president of New Kansas Alliance of Independent Chautauquas. His work as pastor, evangelist and lecturer has reached from coast to coast.

—REV. CHARLES V. LAFONTAINE, pastor of the First Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene, Spokane, Wash., has just closed a month's series of evangelistic services in which 150 persons were at the altar for pardon or for purity of heart. Rev. J. B. McBride of Pasadena, Calif., assisted. Campaign will be held during April, when Rev. L. Milton Williams of Oskaloosa, Iowa, will be the evangelist. Rev. L. N. Fogg, of Sanbornville, N. H., will be the called evangelist for the summer camp meeting of the Nazarene Camp Meeting Association of Eastern Washington, July 8 to 18 at Spokane, Wash.

—A NUMBER OF YOUNG SYRIAN CHRISTIANS in Kunnankulam, Malabar, Southern India, have organized a society for spreading the Gospel in that section. They have opened several Sunday schools in towns and villages, set up a printing-press to publish free vernacular tracts, and started a free public library.

—EVANGELIST H. HUMBLE, of Cincinnati, Ohio, has recently conducted a union meeting of the Methodist and Congregational churches in Belle Fourche, S. D., and a large per cent.

of the number were high school pupils. The campaign was conducted in a large auditorium in the heart of the business district. Pastors stood by the evangelist.

—THE EIGHTY-SIXTH ANNIVERSARY DAY PARADE of the Sunday schools of Brooklyn will be held on Thursday, June 10, 1915. The officers for this year are Charles Francis, marshal in chief; William D. Wilkes, parade marshal, and Charles H. Rue, assistant marshal. Elaborate plans are under way to make this the greatest of all anniversary days and a special campaign to have the entire city decorated is being worked out.

The Protest of the Neutrals

IT IS impossible to read the official correspondence between our government and the governments of Germany and England, relative to the proposed enforcement of the retaliatory blockades, without feeling a sense of disappointment at the disregard not only of existing international laws, but of the rights of humanity, which the situation reveals. In the blind storm of conflict, the belligerents yielded to the temptation to sweep aside existing international laws dealing with the rights of neutrals, and to create a condition which would render legitimate ocean commerce impracticable and virtually deprive the non-combatant nations of their inalienable right to the freedom of the seas.

Our government has made an honest endeavor to persuade Germany and the Allies to make reciprocal concessions and to come to a common understanding, so that peaceful commerce should not be needlessly endangered by floating mines and submarines. Germany's reply expresses a readiness to join in any effort to reach an understanding and conditionally to observe general international rules. Up to March 4 no response had come from England to the American note, although it was still expected. In his address in the Commons, announcing England's proposed blockade of retaliation, which aims to completely isolate Germany and cut her off from all ocean commerce, Premier Asquith explained that the measures would be enforced "without risk to neutral ships or non-combatants' lives and in strict observance of the laws of humanity." This might be reasonably interpreted to apply not only to neutral vessels, their crews and passengers, but also to the case of the Belgian sufferers and other non-combatants who for months past have been subsisting on American relief. But the premier fails to indicate how that relief is to be continued if the Allies, under the new blockade rules, succeed in shutting up the enemy's ports against all ocean commerce. While England is silent on this point (although it may be dealt with later) the German Government has voluntarily rescinded its regulations affecting the safe-conduct of neutral vessels and has informed Dr. Van Dyke, our minister to the Netherlands, that American relief ships bound for Belgium will be assured of safe passage through the naval war zone.

As the Allies have announced their willingness to hear the views of neutrals on all the questions involved, there is a reasonable hope that when the case is presented in behalf of the rights of all the neutral governments, temperate counsels may prevail and such recognition of these rights may be accorded as existing international law demands. Should this be denied the neutrals still have the resource of a vigorous protest.

Since the present war begun, one after another of the usages and obligations of international law has been virtually abrogated, on the plea that new conditions in war have created new necessities and evolved new dangers, which can only be met with new laws. The time has come to demand of the combatant powers a clear and unequivocal recognition of the rights of neutrals in the interest of civilization, justice and humanity.

Drink and Labor

"DRINK is doing us more damage than all the German submarines put together!" So has spoken Lloyd-George, chancellor of the British exchequer. With vodka driven from Russia, absinthe from France, and the British people warned that fearless measures will be taken to save Great Britain from the menace of alcohol; with the German emperor exhorting his armies to abstinence; with the states of the American Union voting "dry" so rapidly that it is difficult to keep prohibition reports up-to-date, the temperance forces seem to be approaching a world-wide triumph.

Mr. Lloyd-George spoke of the indispensable value of the workers of a nation, particularly in time of war. "This war," he said, "is not going to be fought mainly on the battlefields of Belgium and Poland. It is going to be fought in the workshops of France and Great Britain." He rebuked the workers for haggling over questions of pay and time when their best efforts are so urgently demanded, scoring particularly the workers of the Clyde, some of whom are holding out on strike for a farthing more an hour than the amount conceded.

He declared that while the government is not planning so drastic a step as that taken by Russia in prohibiting vodka, or France in prohibiting absinthe, some definite and fearless governmental action will be taken on the drink question.

It will perhaps be startling to many laborers to hear the chancellor's suggestion that it is they, even more than the soldiers, who are fighting the war. It may rouse the old dreams and convictions which the war has for the present overshadowed, that the workers really control the world situation and that as soon as they determine not to fight there will be no more wars. Meanwhile, the deliverance of the worker from the curse of drink, though wrought by the hand of authority rather than his own, will clear his brain and strengthen his muscles for present tasks and furnish him and his posterity with immeasurably increased efficiency for future years.

Two Years of President Wilson

IN THE last hours of the Sixty-third Congress a message was received from the President, expressing his appreciation of the work it had accomplished, the purpose and quality of which, he declared, will be more and more valued by the nation, the longer it is tested. This is very high praise, indeed. Coming at the close of the second year of President Wilson's administration, it naturally suggests a look backward for the purpose of recalling what has actually been accomplished in that period. The Christian Herald is not a political paper in any sense, and the President is to be judged, not by the standards of any political party, but solely on the merits of his administration as they must appeal to the whole nation.

Among the real things accomplished in these two years we need mention only a few. In revising the tariff, the old high tariff shibboleth was forever demolished; and in the reversal of the ancient policy—which had ruled for fifty years—business attained a new freedom. The Federal Reserve System is the concrete application of sane and up-to-date commercial principles to the nation's finances, and is a permanent barrier against recurrent panics. The Panama tolls exemption bill proved how a great nation could keep good faith with the rest of the world. In the two wars that have been begun during this administration, we have preserved a fair and just neutrality, even when there were many obstacles in the way. Few if any of our Presidents of recent times could have so tactfully avoided the dangers that threatened. Critics with sharp tongues and ironical pens derided his methods and called him a visionary. Yes, he had the vision, and it led him safely through. And now the nation knows that he was right!

In dealing with the trusts, he has shown more skill than his predecessors. Their regulation has proceeded with less disturbance than the alarmists predicted. The business of the nation today is conducted under better conditions than in the past; and the men at the head of great enterprises, while compelled to give full observance to the requirement of Federal laws, are no longer a target for oppression and persecution.

In his parting message to Congress, President Wilson sounded the keynote of his whole administration in these words:

"The constant thought of every patriotic man should now be for the country—its peace, its order, its just and temperate judgment in the face of perplexing difficulties. Its dignity and its strength alike will appear, not only in the revival of its business despite abnormal conditions, but also in its power to think, to propose and to act with patience, with disinterested fairness and without excitement, in a spirit of friendliness and enlightenment, which will firmly establish its influence throughout the world."

These are strong, clear words—the language of a patriotic servant of the people—and they deserve to be remembered.

Palestine's Future

WHILE the bombardment of the Dardanelles progresses, speculation grows as to the future of the Turkish Empire. One of the latest suggestions with regard to the ultimate disposition of Palestine, which is now being discussed both here and abroad, is that some powerful neutral state may be chosen as the responsible supervisory agent in the event of the Holy Land being permanently separated from the Ottoman Empire. In some European capitals, the cable informs us, it has been suggested that the United States, as the leading neutral power, and one which guarantees the free exercise of religion, is best selected for this responsible task. It is argued that there is no nation among the present belligerents which could so acceptably undertake the governing of Palestine and of caring for its holy places without arousing antagonism and religious conflict.

This would be a strange climax to the cherished history of the ancient Jewish homeland. It is not difficult to imagine the Palestine of the future, under republican rule, again a center of world interest and activity, its cities restored, its once fruitful soil gardenized anew, its holy places again being shrines of visitation for the Christians of the world. Many natural advantages contribute to make Palestine one of the most fertile and beautiful countries. To the dispersed Jews, such a change would make it the center of all dreams and ambitions. The Holy City itself would even regain something of its former greatness and glory.

Zionists have dreamed of the restoration of the Jewish state, and such a result as we have pictured might more nearly fulfil such a hope than anything else that seems likely to happen. Palestine is today the most sacred land on earth, not only to the Jew and the Christian, but even to the Mohammedan. Under an American protectorate, all religions could enjoy the utmost equality and freedom, and the ancient land, which has been battle-torn for twice twenty centuries, would once more be at peace. It is a dream worth dreaming and which may yet become true.

"Pay-Up Week" in the West

IT IS now over a year since a little town in Wisconsin originated a bright idea, which seems to have taken root in a very large section of the state. When the town in question announced its purpose of observing "Pay-Up Week," in which debtors would make settlement en masse, everybody smiled; but the thing was done and several thousand unsettled bills were cleared in the process. Now the place has had its most prosperous year, and many other Western towns and not a few big cities are contemplating a "Pay-Up Week." The philosophy of the plan is simply this: that by paying your bills, the other fellow is enabled to pay his, and so on in a sort of endless chain, which really comes around to you again. Thus all are quitted, the commercial skies are clear, and everybody feels better. In the first experiment over $40,000 of old accounts changed hands, and the liquidation of this year promises to be a financial tidal wave. The idea of a "Pay-Up Week" is excellent, and should be pushed along.

The Right to Work

TO PERMIT alien immigrants to come to this country and then deny them the right to labor is an absurdity on its face. Conflicts with the fundamental principle that aliens, as presumptive citizens, are to share the common privilege of earning their own living and are to be encouraged in industry and self-support. Never till now has it been contemplated that this class of future citizens could be denied this right by any legislature in any state. All the laws that properly apply to the status of the citizen, present or prospective, are of Federal origin, and any state-made law restricting their privileges, and especially affecting their right to labor, is held to be unconstitutional. This is the view of authorities who have given consideration to the question raised affecting alien labor in New York. An almost forgotten law was found on the statute books, which provided that municipalities taking public works must employ citizen workmen only. No one can remember any previous enforcement of this law, which has now been dragged to the light and made operative, with the result of throwing many thousands of unskilled alien workmen out of employment at a time when their services cannot be filled advantageously by citizen labor, and even then compulsorily at rates largely in excess of those usually paid to unskilled labor.

The right to labor is not exclusively a citizen's right. If we have no better use for immigrants than to consign them to tramping, we should shut the gates against all immigration forthwith. But the better and wiser way is to repeal the statute, which threatens most unjustly to add to the already large army of the unemployed and indigent, for whom the state must care, thus increasing the burdens of the citizen instead of lightening them.

The BIBLE and NEWSPAPER

FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Brutal Punishment for Son

A BOY at Phillips, Wis., disobeyed his father and went to a dance, and came home after the carousal late at night. The father fastened about the boy's neck a twenty-one pound piece of railroad iron and then attached a heavy log chain to it, which was seven feet in length. Then he compelled his son, with this disgraceful encumbrance, to walk to school and back, for three days, with the thermometer twenty degrees below zero. The community was aroused with indignation, and the sheriff had to take the boy to the blacksmith's to have the iron fetters cut away. The son may or may not have been a bad boy, but nothing could justify such harsh, brutal treatment by a father. Such discipline would not only contribute to constitution badness in the child; would wither all self-respect and have a tendency to whatever affection the child might have for his parent. The trouble nowways usually the other way. The mother and mothers are not enough in compelling the discipline necessary to the retraining of the child, comfort of the family and community generally, and harshness and cruelty are far rather than from the parent. Love is the thing that wins in conquering the child's heart. If we can see obedience with tenderness and persuasion, very good; if necessary it should be told up with authority, with some form of punishment. The railroad iron about the child's neck and log chain dangling were a mockery of fatherhood, and a mockery of boyhood; but the child of disobedience, fastened about the father's or mother's neck by the son or daughter, is as great a mockery of fatherhood and motherhood and wreckage of child. The good Book gives his salutary advice: "Correct thy son and he shall give thee rest; yea, he shall give thee rest into thy soul." (Prov. 13:24.)

Peas Kills Wolves

THE state of Texas and other wild beasts even the sheep in such abundance as to seriously reduce the wool crop. In September 1912, a law went into effect, granting a bounty for every wild beast destroyed. In the first eighteen months the state reported that 98,000 wolves and wild animals (including 53 panthers and 22 leopards) had been killed and the bounties secured. It would be incredible that a state having a population of 1,000,000 people could be so overrun by wild beasts. The scourge is not yet over, but the people will not let them all out before long. Christ likened his sheep to sheep, and those who would ruin their sheep compared to wolves, and described his disciples and that of the pastors set to care for the flock as that of a shepherd. The sheep-killing incident of the wolf in Palestine is thus mentioned: "The wolf catcheth them, and scattereth the sheep." (John 10:12.)

A Kansas Preacher-Judge

EVJ. H. RICE, pastor of the First Congregational Church of Emporia, Kansas, was appointed judge of the police court by his friend, Job Hammer, nine months ago. They call Judge Rice in the "South End," where his place is located, and the Rev. Dr. Rice in the "North End," where his church stands. The chief judge in his court has introduced the leniency, love and wholesome advice toward criminals, and the reports are that it works like a charm. It is a court of fact, not of suspicion. The judge sentenced one bad boy to go to church. He set other prisoners to work cutting up the dead trees in the city into firewood, and had it hauled to their homes. His salary he devotes to the cause of the suffering families of the accused and convicted. He does all the preaching and pastoral work of his church besides. William Allen White, Emporia's most distinguished citizen, recently united with that church. Such would be a debatable experiment for the average minister, but Judge Rice has made good in both functions. He obeyed literally this injunction: "Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's." (Mark 12:17.)

braces forever. For Christ, who is in heaven, and brought us heaven, thus sweetly and gloriously describes it as "my Father's house." "In my Father's house are many mansions." (John 14:2.)

Pauper had Money

SURROUNDED by every evidence of poverty and squalor a widow died from old age and insufficient nutrition in her two-room apartment in New York City the other day. After her death Policeman Crossley found in one of the rooms five savings bank deposit books, showing that the woman had a total of $12,000 in cash to her credit in the banks. For the past seven years she had lived in her rooms on the scanty bounty of neighbors who supposed her penniless. No one ever dreamed the woman possessed a dollar. She had lived the life of a pauper, a beggar, and died, the neighbors think, from weakness, caused from insufficient nutrition, and from the cold. She loved money for its own sake, living in discomfort, a poor miser. It is the most charitable thing to believe that the poor old woman was mentally unsound. There are people who have good food and clothing, and fine horses, and an abundance of ready money to spend on themselves, but who are poisoned by the same avarice that blighted the life of the old woman who pretended to be a pauper. Such instances call to mind the truth of these words: "For the love of money is the root of all evil." (1 Tim. 6:10.)

War on Alcohol

THE Russian minister of finance, M. Bark, in a recent interview with the correspondent of the New York American in Petrograd, makes some statements of supreme importance on the value of the prohibition of the liquor traffic to the financial and moral welfare of his nation. Among other things he says: "It is difficult for beginners to realize how great are Russian economic resources and how much greater they have become since the promulgation of that humanitarian law forbidding the sale or consumption of alcohol. I can assure you that the productivity of every class of workman in Russia, whether we examine those engaged in agriculture or industrial pursuits, has already increased from 30 to 50 per cent., and I hardly need point out to you what that one fact means in a population of 170,000,000, to say nothing of the cessation of the waste which formerly accompanied and followed the consumption of alcohol. Again, the rates for the maintenance of prisoners have fallen, because crime has everywhere diminished, and in some districts has disappeared. The reports I have secured from the savings banks are so encouraging that even I, whose faith in the Russian people has been large and firm, did not anticipate the rapid and splendid results which they indicate." There are evidences that the British Government is prepared to deal with the drink traffic with a strong hand. In February Iowa's legislature repealed the Muley law, which if signed or passed over the governor's veto will make the state dry. Idaho went dry by statutory provision, the measure having been recommended by Governor Moses Alexander (who is a Jew), making the eighteenth state to pass into the prohibition column, eight of them becoming dry in the past six months. There seems to be a race-wide war on rum, the nations waking up to the truth of the wise man's words with reference to alcohol: "At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." (Prov. 23:32.)

Brothers, Long Separated, Meet

GEORGE H. RICHARDSON and John C. Richardson, who lived near Petersburg, Ind., became separated from each other twenty-nine years ago and lost trace of each other till the other day, when they accidentally met on the streets of Venice, Ill. The men recognized each other and were overcome with surprise and joy. The fact was revealed that each had lived in the same neighborhood in Venice and was unaware of the presence of the other. A family reunion was called to celebrate the meeting. In stationary civilizations, like that of China, members of a family have lived for a hundred or maybe several hundred years on the same farm or in the same neighborhood. While much of motion and progress is lost, there is the compensation of pleasant relationship and of comfort. In our complex and swiftly moving civilization, it is the rule for the children to strike out for themselves, for families to scatter to different neighborhoods or states and even countries. In the intense and large enterprises of our times it is the exception that families settle down close to each other and enjoy the fellowship so precious and divine. It is comforting to be assured that after all the mutations of earth, the flight of the years and the separation of families, we shall meet our loved ones again, and shall see their faces and enjoy their em-

URUGUAY PEACE TREATY SIGNED

THE Uruguay peace treaty was recently signed by Secretary Bryan and Don Juan Carlos Blanco of Uruguay, a special emissary sent by his government for the purpose. The signing was witnessed by a number of the representatives of the United States and Uruguay. The latter is the smallest of the independent countries of South America. The signature of this treaty was beautiful. It is not a mockery to sign peace compacts at this time when a majority of the people of the world are engaged in war. It is rather a good example to set, and we have the pledge that the principle underlying it shall ultimately prevail. The pan-American peace treaties strengthen the doctrine which our country has always held, that the United States and the South American republics were fully able to take care of their own affairs, and that any serious interference upon the part of foreign nations would not be tolerated. All national or international unity and peace that are to be enduring must have as their basis the union of the individual heart with God through Christ, and the union with each other through our relation to him, for which he prayed: "That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me." (John 17:21.)

RECOLLECTIONS OF FANNY CROSBY

"MY personal acquaintance with Fanny Crosby," writes Rev. Charles Elmer Furman, pastor of Belknap Congregational Church, Dover, N. H., to the Christian Herald, "has suggested to me to give a few reminiscences. Many of them relate to interviews with the poet during my stay at her home last June.

"She always maintained a uniformly pleasant disposition, and was always very pleasant. Her temperament was unfailingly sunny and cheerful. She was remarkably diligent, too—was a determined student and would study for hours on a composition until she finally got it as she wished it to be.

"For a blind person, she was very courageous and would go about the house alone. At meals she needed but little assistance. She could tell a friend by the tone of the voice.

"Unlike some authors, she could never compose while in bed. She never attempted to write a hymn until she had first prayed over it. 'I've got no lonely hours,' she told me. 'I've got my thoughts to keep me company. I couldn't engage in card playing; I couldn't! I couldn't! I couldn't!' Then she told me the story of a railroad man whose son was ruined by card playing. She seriously objected to being regarded as aged or infirm. 'I'm Methodistical,' she declared while discussing her denomination. 'If any one feels like saying, Hallelujah, praise the Lord! why, say it.'

"Dr. W. H. P. Rhoades, a Baptist pastor from Brooklyn, invited her, a Methodist, to partake of communion at his church with him and she did.

"I'm four feet three inches tall," she told me at that visit. "I was four feet five, but I've shrunk up some. I weigh eighty-four and a half pounds. I couldn't tell a falsehood to save my life," she declared. "I was frightened into this by the instance of Ananias and Sapphira."

"On another occasion she said: 'I have nothing that I have not received from God. I never undertake to write without asking divine assistance. The Lord worketh in me to do of his good pleasure, and he wants me to work it out.' Again she said: 'I'm the receptacle for everybody's troubles; but I've found the Balm of Gilead.'

"My grandmother used to call me 'Fanny Flewit,' because I flew around so," she told me with an amused smile during our conversation.

"In her room at her home in Bridgeport, I can recall seeing the photograph of Charles Alexander, the Gospel singer, marked II Tim. 2: 15, and a picture of Ira D. Sankey seated at the organ with Fanny sitting near by. There was a little rocker in the room in which she usually sat while writing or dictating her poems. There were also pictures of Sylvester Main and Hubert B. Main, and also a Madonna and Child and a miniature painting of Henry Clay.

"It was such things she treasured.

Prison, New York, before an audience of 500, who was present, was so deeply affected that she had to be carried out. She spoke to the inmates of the prison and said, 'If I knew you were all the way to heaven, I would say, "Now, Lord, let thy servant die in peace."'

"While composing, she would frequently hold a little book to her mouth, which seemed to aid in calling to remembrance anything she wished to write.

"She had pronounced views concerning criticism. 'Critics have no right to challenge the Bible,' she said. 'The old Book is just as it tended it to be.'

"She was a staunch and loyal friend. 'I would rather burn my hand off than betray a confidence,' she remarked during our conversation; 'I would be true as steel to a friend.'

A Fanny Crosby Memorial

A MOVEMENT has been begun in Bridgeport, Conn., with a view to the erection of a permanent memorial to the great hymn-writer. It is proposed that the should take the form of a memorial building used by the Bridgeport Christian Union as a "Soul-Saving Station." The poet was a frequent attendant at the mission services of the Christian Union and was greatly interested in its work. A committee has been organized and it is proposed to have an international committee also, in order that the movement may be shared in by the churches throughout this country and other lands, where the hymns of Fanny Crosby are known and loved.

CHAPTER XXI

COMRADES

THEY were a merry party and a congenial one. There seemed to be no end to the new delights that came every new day, not the least of which was the new charm of companionship that seemed to be a part of this new life they were living.

As Jamie said one night, when they were all sitting about the fire:

"You see, we seem to know each other so much better up here in the woods—better in a week than we would in a year in town."

"I know it. I wonder why," murmured Mrs. Carew, her eyes dreamily following the leaping blaze.

"I think it's something in the air," sighed Pollyanna, happily. "There's something about the sky and woods and the lake so—so—well, there just is; that's all."

"I think you mean, because the world is shut out," cried Sadie Dean, with a curious little break in her voice. (Sadie had not joined in the laugh that followed Pollyanna's limping conclusion.) "Up here everything is so real and true that we, too, can be our real true selves—not what the world says we are because we are rich, or poor, or great, or humble; but what we really are, ourselves."

"Ho!" scoffed Jimmy, airily. "All that sounds very fine; but the real common sense reason is because we don't have any Mrs. Tom and Dick and Harry sitting on their side porches watching us."

"Oh, Jimmy, how you do take the poetry out of things!" reproached Pollyanna, laughingly.

"But that's my business," flashed Jimmy. "How do you suppose I'm going to build dams and bridges if I don't see something besides poetry in the waterfall?"

"You can't, Pendleton! And it's the bridge that counts every time," declared Jamie in a voice that brought a sudden hush to the group about the fire. It was for only a moment, however, for almost at once Sadie Dean broke the silence with a gay:

"Pooh! It'd rather have the waterfall every time, without any bridge around—to spoil the view!"

Everybody laughed—and it was as if a tension somewhere snapped. Then Mrs. Carew rose to her feet.

"Come, come, children, your stern chaperon says it's bedtime!" And with a merry chorus of good-nights the party broke up.

And so the days passed. To Pollyanna they were wonderful days, and still the most wonderful part was the charm of close companionship—a companionship that, while differing as to details with each one, was yet delightful with all.

With Sadie Dean she talked of the new Home, and of what a marvelous work Mrs. Carew was doing. They talked, too, of the old days when Sadie was selling bows behind the counter, and of what Mrs. Carew had done for her. Pollyanna heard, also, something of the old father and mother "back home," and of the joy that Sadie, in her new position, had been able to bring into their lives.

"And after all it's really you that began it, you know," she said one day to Pollyanna. But Pollyanna only shook her head at this with an emphatic:

"Nonsense! It was all Mrs. Carew."

With Mrs. Carew herself Pollyanna talked also of the Home, and of her plans for the girls. And once, in the hush of a twilight walk, Mrs. Carew spoke of herself and of her changed outlook on life. And she, like Sadie Dean, said brokenly: "After all, it's really you that began it, Pollyanna." But Pollyanna, as in Sadie Dean's case, would have none of this; and began to talk of Jamie, and of what he had done.

"Jamie's a dear," Mrs. Carew answered affectionately. "And I love him like an own son. He couldn't be dearer to me if he were really my sister's boy."

"Then you don't think he is?"

"I don't know. We've never learned anything conclusive. Sometimes I'm sure he is. Then again I doubt it. I think he really believes he is—bless his heart! At all events, one thing is sure; he has good blood in him from somewhere. Jamie's no ordinary waif of the streets, you know, with his talents; and the wonderful way he responded to teaching and training proves it."

"Of course," nodded Pollyanna. "And as long as you love him so well, it doesn't really matter, anyway, does it, whether he's the real Jamie or not?"

Mrs. Carew hesitated. Into her eyes crept the old somberness of heart-ache.

"Not so far as he is concerned," she sighed, at last. "It's only that sometimes I get to thinking: if he isn't our Jamie, where is—Jamie Kent? Is he well? Is he happy? Has he any one to love him? When I get to thinking like that, Pollyanna, I'm nearly wild. I'd give—everything I have in the world, it seems to me, to really know that this boy is Jamie Kent."

Pollyanna used to think of this conversation sometimes in her after talks with Jamie. Jamie was so sure of himself.

"It's just somehow that I feel that it's so," he said once to Pollyanna. "I believe I am Jamie Kent. I've believed it quite a while. I'm afraid I've believed it so long now, that—that I just couldn't bear it, to find out that I wasn't he. Mrs. Carew has done so much for me; just think if, after all, I were only a stranger!"

"But she—loves you, Jamie."

"I know she does—and that would only hurt all the more—don't you see?—because it would be hurting her. She wants me to be the real Jamie. I know she does. Now if I could only do something for her—to make her proud of me in some way! If I could only do something to support myself, even, like a man! But what can I do, with—these?" He spoke bitterly, and laid his hand on the crutches at his side.

Pollyanna was shocked and distressed. It was the first time she had heard Jamie speak of his infirmity since the old boyhood days. Frantically she cast about in her mind for just the right thing to say; but before she had even thought of anything, Jamie's face had undergone a complete change.

"But, there, forget it! I didn't mean to say it," he cried gaily. "Ar'twasthank heresy to the game, wa't it? I'm sure I'm glad I've got the crutches. They're a whole lot nicer than the wheel chair!"

"And the Jolly Book—do you see it now?" asked Pollyanna, in a voice that trembled a little.

"Sure! I've got a whole lot of jolly books now," he retorted. "They're all in leather, dark red, except a first one. That is the same little book that Jerry gave me."

"Jerry! And I've been meaning all the time to ask for him," cried Pollyanna. "Where is he?"

"In Boston; and his vocabulary is just as picturesque as ever, only he has to tone it down at times. Jerry's still in the newspaper business—I haven't been getting the news, not selling. Reporting, you know. I have been able to help him and mumsy. And don't you suppose I was glad? Mum's in a sanatorium for her rheumatism."

"And is she better?"

"Very much. She's coming out pretty soon, and going to housekeeping with Jerry. Jerry's been making a good deal of his lost schooling during the few years. He's let me help him—only as a loan. He's been very particular to stipulate that."

"Of course," nodded Pollyanna in approval. "He'd want it that way, I'm sure. I should. It isn't nice to be under obligations that you can't pay. I know how it is. That's why I wish I could help Aunt Polly out—after all she's done for me!"

"But you are helping her this summer."

Pollyanna lifted her eyebrows. "Yes, I'm keeping summer boarders. I look it, don't I?" she challenged, with a flourish of her hands toward her surroundings. "Surely, never was a boarding house mistress's task nearer than mine! And you should have seen Aunt Polly's dire predictions of summer boarders would be so chucked irrepressibly."

"What was that?"

Pollyanna shook her head. "Couldn't possibly tell you. That's a dead secret. But—"

LABOR JOB THAT WON'T WORK. The attempt by the unions to resuscitate a forgotten clause in the labor law of New York State in order to debar alien workmen from employment upon public works, although for the moment supported by the state constitution may be defeated by special legislation already under way at Albany. Meanwhile contractors having in hand the construction of New York's new subway have laid off several thousand alien laborers, skilled and unskilled, and the great project involving millions of dollars is almost at a standstill.

"FO SOME MUST WORK WHILE OTHERS PLAY." The Senate of the Sixty-third Congress failed to take up and pass the Palmer bill passed by the House and favorably reported on by the Senate providing that the products of child labor could be shipped in interstate commerce. So, of course, such products can be so shipped, hence the caution to this paragraph.

REIGN OF TERROR POSTPONED. Believing, and without reason, that by murdering in cold blood the leading financiers of the country, and destroying a few notable buildings, a reign of terror might be set up for the benefit of the immigrants and the criminals of the land, a gang of anarchists in New York concocted a plot for the accomplishment of such acts, and in the early morning of March 2 Frank Arbano and Charles Carbone, young Italians, entered St. Patrick's Cathedral, while several hundred worshippers were at mass, and placed powerful bombs at the feet of two of the great pillars. Unfortunately for those who would improve conditions by such methods, the police department had all along been aware of what was in progress, and through detectives who had succeeded in joining the anarchist gang and assisting their plans step by step, had been able to set a trap at the cathedral, a number of detectives sprung as scrub-women and herve being in readiness to arrest the Italians, who were promptly taken into custody. The police department claims to have in its possession evidence that will aid in the arrest of other anarchists and the exposure of a wide plot of wide extent. New York, which holds its police department in high esteem, tried to feel that it had escaped an awful tragedy, but somehow the apprehension prevails that it has allied itself to a diversion. In other words, the public is skeptical about the affair, though the press courageously spread the story in much detail upon its pages. The arrested Italians claim the alien detective Polignani, who played the leading rôle in their arrest, instigated the entire plot.

SCIENCE INCREASES OUR NATIONAL WEALTH. A young scientist connected with the Federal Bureau of Mines, Dr. Walter F. Rittman, premar has added immensely to the resources of this country by two discoveries announced late in February, one of which is a cheap process for extracting some 200 per cent. more gasoline from crude petroleum than by existing methods; the other making possible the extraction from crude petroleum of toluol and benzol, essentials in manufacturing dye stuffs and high explosives, this country's supply heretofore being obtained in Germany. The discoveries are looked upon by the government as of the first importance, and commercial chemists are withholding their opinions until practical demonstrations have been made. Dr. Rittman, who is but thirty-two years of age, attributes his success in large measure to the possession of a strong will to endure the long strains incident to experimental work by illegitimate methods. If his discoveries become commercially practicable he will be one of the most notable contributions of science to our industries.

A SPECIALIST FORECAST OF THE WAR. One of the ablest of European specialists, Karl Kautsky, lately wrote a series of articles on the war, in the last of which he makes the following prediction: "We may expect that a war of this magnitude will suffice to give rise to as strong a feeling of need for a lasting peace as did the twenty years of war a hundred years ago. Perhaps it will, as that war was, be brought to a close by an international congress. The combatants already number nearly a dozen; an armistice of them alone, to conclude peace, would constitute an international congress. It would be time to wait to apportion not Europe but rather the world. The neutrals, too, would be a part of a country as they were a hundred years ago. They could not simply ignore their wishes. Under these circumstances it is probable that this congress, supported by the general longing for peace, would consummate a work at least as enduring as that of the Congress of Vienna. But a fifty years' peace is not a permanent, an everlasting peace. For in that brief time the proletariat will have beyond doubt have advanced to the point where it will have arranged the world according to its own needs. And among those needs are reckoned international solidarity and a policy which secures lasting peace among nations. The ideal of so many thinkers of the last three hundred years will then be realized, not as an ethical postulate but as an actual necessity of a definite social order. Every system of exploitation will disappear."

lax rule of Obregon would permit anti-foreign demonstrations in Mexico City accompanied by looting and worse. Foreign diplomats took joint action to learn the intentions of the United States as regards Mexican disorders, especially in Mexico City, and Secretary Bryan, through American Consul Silliman at Vera Cruz, made positive representations to Carranza which apparently are bringing to pass a modification of the anti-foreign spirit. Food and other necessary supplies to the city's population were growing short because of the exclusive use of the railroads for military transportation, and this and other menaces to international amity have given way, it is said, before Secretary Bryan's stand. There is a rumor that Obregon is ambitious to supersede Carranza as first chief of the Constitutional Party, but this he denies. The general situation in Mexico cannot be said to be improving.

Miners from surrounding towns formed rescue parties to aid the trained crew, and these penetrated the mine as fast as the fans cleared the tunnels. Many of the entombed miners were brought to the surface unconscious. The rescue work was kept up continuously, and one by one the men, living or dead, were found and removed, forty-seven miners being brought to the surface on Saturday, four days after the accident, and shortly after five men, who had waited until the air pressure reached them, made their way out; the latter reported nine other men left behind who were too weak to come of themselves, and rescuers found them. All these had had but their one meal, taken into the mines on Tuesday. The force of the explosion was so great that much damage was done to surrounding buildings, and one man, seventy-five yards from the mine entrance, was thrown against a pole and killed.

SEA CATASTROPHE BARELY AVERTED. The afternoon papers of March 6 reported the French Line Steamship Touraine on fire several hundred miles from Havre, her destination, and that several other steamers were hastening to her assistance. Great anxiety was created by these reports, especially as it had been stated that the steamer would carry a considerable quantity of ammunition; among her passengers were a number of Americans. Despatches received March 8, however, indicate that the fire was confined to one compartment in the hold and was under control, and that it had not been found necessary to transfer passengers to other ships and no fears were entertained by the officers aboard the Touraine for the safety of their vessel.

BUDGET OF THE SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS.

The Sixty-third Congress, which ended its duties on March 4, broke all records in appropriations. Its totals aggregate $2,250,626,579, or about $130,000,000 more than the appropriations of its predecessor. Appropriations for the coming year are as follows: Agricultural, $22,971,532; army, $101,974,165; diplomatic and consular, $4,061,280; District of Columbia, $11,859,584; fortifications, $6,060,216; Indian, $11,255,865; legislative, executive and judicial, $36,904,799; Military Academy, $1,069,813; navy, $147,538,981; pension, $164,100,000; postoffice, $317,948,869; sundry civil, $126,922,750; rivers and harbors, $30,000,000; general deficiency, $7,917,485; urgent deficiency, $4,398,858; permanent annual, $131,196,407; omnibus claims, $2,000,000. THE UNPLEASANTNESS IN MEXICO.

The only Mexican ruler concerning whom much has been in the press recently is General Carranza, who is ensconced at Vera Cruz as his temporary capital, General Obregon representing him in Mexico City. Lacking the stabilizing control of an established government, the lawless element in Mexico is attempting to make the most of the situation, and for a short time it was feared that the

THE CANAL IS SULKY. Evidently put out because it was not, after all, to be the scene of pageantry early in March as originally planned, the Panama Canal shut itself up tight at the Culebra Cut by a new earth slide March 3, and only consented to resume its proper functions under the coaxing of the powerful dredges which promptly started their simply irresistible persuasions the next day.

ENTRAPPED MINERS PERISH IN COAL PITS. One hundred and eighty-two miners, most of them of foreign birth, though including a number of Americans, one of them an assistant mine boss, were caught by an explosion of gases in the Layland coal mines near Quinnimont, W. Va., March 2, and although a rescue car and crew were quickly despatched to the scene by the United States Bureau of Mines, more than one hundred are believed to have perished. Miners from surrounding towns formed rescue parties to aid the trained crew, and these penetrated the mine as fast as the fans cleared the tunnels. Many of the entombed miners were brought to the surface unconscious. The rescue work was kept up continuously, and one by one the men, living or dead, were found and removed, forty-seven miners being brought to the surface on Saturday, four days after the accident, and shortly after five men, who had waited until the air pressure reached them, made their way out; the latter reported nine other men left behind who were too weak to come of themselves, and rescuers found them. The force of the explosion was so great that much damage was done to surrounding buildings, and one man, seventy-five yards from the mine entrance, was thrown against a pole and killed.

PRESIDENT TO REMAIN IN WASHINGTON. Presumably because of the international situation, President Wilson, according to report, has abandoned his intended transcontinental trip to the Panama-Pacific Exposition and the series of visits to cities en route, at least for some time to come.

Reader, W. Va. I have been a member of the church since I was a child. Have tried to do my duty and live a Christian life, but have never been truly satisfied, and do not feel the witness of the Spirit that I am a child of God. Yet my whole desire is to know God truly and love him with my whole being. I seek him continuously. Why can I not find peace? Why do I have so many doubts and fears? I try to live for God and do his holy will in the best way I know how. Have I done a wrong by staying in the church? I have studied, mourned and prayed until sometimes I am almost discouraged. Can you help me?

Our spiritual problems are made simpler if we stick close to the question of sin. (Happiness or unhappiness, success or failure, safety, or danger, all relate back to the fundamental problem of sin.) When any soul is in distress it should force itself back to a plain and emphatic settlement of the sin question. Now, are your sins forgiven or are they not? You have asked God to forgive you; what does he say? Your fears say he has not forgiven you; Satan says he has not; unbelief says he has not. But God himself says he has. Christ is saying to you, as he said to those who sought help from him long ago: "Thy sins are forgiven thee." Are you going to trust all these false voices and refuse to believe him? Would he deceive you? Take him at his word. You will feel instantly the peace of forgiveness in your heart. The promises of cleansing from sin are just as emphatic. "He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." "Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean." Now, as you take God at his word in these matters of forgiving and cleansing, you will find yourself rejoicing. His presence will be a reality. You will know he is your Saviour and your Friend. Future clouds will be dispelled by that heroic determination to trust his word about saving you from sin. Then as you grow more and more busy in telling others about your gladness and leading them to trust him too, the light will grow brighter and brighter, your faith stronger, your strength for service greater. Don't worry about whether you have done right to stay in the church. You are in it. Now make yourself a strong, efficient, faithful member by believing that the name of Jesus really means that "he shall save his people from their sins."

A. B. C., Holton, Ind. Does God forgive people who say they forgive only when forgiveness is asked? Could any one go on having a hard feeling against another and at the same time expect God's forgiveness?

It would be hard to make any such principle fit in with these words of Jesus: "I say unto you, Love your enemies; bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you" (Matt. 5: 44); or the words of Paul, quoted from Proverbs: "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink." (Rom. 12: 20, Prov. 25: 21.) In the passage in Matthew about forgiving "until seventy times seven" (Matt. 18: 22) nothing at all is said about forgiveness being asked, though in Luke 17: 3, 4, mention is made of the repentance of the trespasser. The point is that a Christian who has been wronged must have the forgiving spirit, whether forgiveness is asked or not. He cannot cherish bitterness and resentment in his heart. He must be like his divine Master, who prayed: "Father, forgive them," even while he was being crucified (Luke 23: 34), and like Stephen, who prayed for his murderers as he died: "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." (Acts 7: 60.) But in the nature of the case, forgiveness cannot actually be received by the offending party until he has a sense of guilt and a desire for pardon. An offer of forgiveness would be meaningless to one who has no feeling of having done wrong. God has pardoned us long ago, but we really do not get that pardon into our consciousness until we feel our need of it and ask for it. So while we must love those who wrong us and must forgive them instantly and fully in our hearts as soon as the wrong is done, they cannot possess and enjoy our forgiveness until they desire and welcome it. Yet S. H. Hadley used to say, in telling about his work for the drunkards and outcasts: "If a man cheats me nineteen times I shame him out of his frauds by trusting him the twentieth." Certainly one who has not this forgiving spirit cannot expect nor receive God's forgiveness.

Forgiveness is a detail of the greater feeling of love. We must love every one; and in doing this we automatically and instantly forgive all who wrong us.

S. K. S., Philadelphia. Please state the ten Bible chapters which you consider most appropriate for children between 8 and 14 to memorize.

We would suggest the following: John 14; I Cor. 13; Psalm 1; Psalm 23; Isa. 53; John 15; Eph. 6; Col. 3; I John 3; Rev. 22. Also such fragments as Eccles. 12: 1-7; Phil. 4: 4-7; Matt. 5: 1-12; Matt. 11: 28-30, and, of course, the children's verse, Mark 10: 14.

sort energetically facing the home situation and doing all that lies in their power to relieve cases of suffering within their reach.

G. F. B., Standard, La. 1. In his reply to the plea of the penitent thief, Jesus gave him as the reward of his faith "what he needed most—the assurance of rest and peace. The word 'paradise' meant to the dying man repose and shelter, the greatest contrast possible to the thirst and agony and shame of the hours upon the cross," is the explanation of one commentator. Paul has spoken of degrees of heavenly exaltation (II Cor. 12: 3) and the religious teaching of the Jews of his day taught this. There has

BY CHARLES GRANT MILLER

CHICAGO has lost the chief laughingstock of the downtown district. "Old Doc" Hanson during the whole period of his life there—and that was a long time, for he was born in an old-time Chicago cabin and was past ninety when he died the other day—was a constant object of ridicule and the butt of jokes.

He was queer looking, his pompous mien enhanced by a high silk hat, a long coat and the inevitable cane. And so they laughed at sight of him.

He talked queerly, blundering through a profusion of polysyllables to express quaint notions and undergoing facial contortions that emphasized his sincere conviction that he was uttering profoundest wisdom. And so they laughed at his talk and prodded him with questions and silly suggestions to keep him going.

He acted more queerly than he looked and talked. He had a queer habit of going quietly about helping other people.

He was a negro and he loved and was proud of his race.

Whenever a negro got into trouble, "Old Doc" Hanson, if he knew of it, was on hand. And people laughed.

Many a plea he has made in the police court for some friendless man or woman, whom he deemed innocent or a victim of untoward circumstances. And the court room was in a roar of laughter.

Many a dollar has he stolen from his own slim store to secretly help some one in need.

He never waited for want and misery to hunt him up; he was ever on the lookout, and his hand was ever ready. And they thought him the greatest fool that ever was; and when he got "sold," as sometimes he did, they laughed and laughed.

He had a crude knowledge of the uses of simple medicines, which he had picked up in some unknown way, and this he applied even more mysteriously than he had received it. It was very funny, and people laughed and laughed and laughed.

The poor, black or white, never wanted for treatment if he knew of their sickness.

Pain and poverty touched his heart-strings that were attuned to heavenly symphonies. He freely offered all that he had. He was queer, indeed.

For long, long years he was the familiar angel at the bedside of suffering. If better medical assistance than his could be afforded, he still remained as nurse, faithful day and night, until the dread specter had passed by.

No epidemic deterred him. No scourge caused him to turn aside. He knew no thought of self when pain appealed.

And so, a little while ago, he went to care for a case of smallpox, as he had cared for many a like case before.

But God decided the old man had been laughed at long enough. He wanted angels like that up in heaven.

Hanson was taken with the smallpox, went to the detention hospital and there died. As his radiant spirit slipped from his queer worn-out old body, he might have breathed this prayer:

"Earth bears no balsam for mistakes;

Men crown the knave and scourge the tool

That did his will; but thou, O Lord,

Be merciful to me, a fool."

It was a sadly faded smile that passed round downtown at the news that the quaint figure had passed away, to be laughed at no more. It was a smile that had no mirth in it, but was like a gleam of sunlight over ice. A strange something rose in the throats, but it was not a laugh.

One may be weak or doubtful in theology, but somehow one feels sure that "Old Doc" has somewhere found a better place and better appreciation than he found here.

Mrs. D. N. F., Three Rivers, Mich., writes: "I do not believe nor have I ever believed one-half I read about the needs of those foreign countries; but I do know that right at our own doors are thousands of poor, needy creatures, too proud to ask aid, who are being starved and frozen. I believe in the old adage 'charity begins at home.'" Our correspondent is doubtless quite sincere in her energetic plea for the home sufferers, but she is mistaken in thinking that they are overlooked or forgotten. The Christian Herald is only one among many agencies that are doing relief work at home as well as abroad. We should like to see our churches and religious organizations of every been much discussion as to the promise spoken by the Saviour. However we may interpret it, it conveyed to the repentant man the assurance that his future place would be one best fitted for him, and that his faith would not go for naught. Speculation beyond this is futile. 2. Adoption, in the theological sense, is "that act of God's free grace by which, when we are justified by faith in Christ, we are received into the family of God, and become heirs to the heavenly inheritance." See Rom. 8: 17; II Cor. 6: 18; Rom. 8: 15, 16. The certainty of one's adoption and of the inheritance warranted by it are counted among the attributes of the new birth.

A. L., Foxboro, Ont., Canada. John, the younger of the two sons of Zebedee, a fisherman. His father appears to have comparatively good circumstances, owning a vessel and having hired servants. John was of a mild and gentle disposition, full and affectionate. Nor did he join in strifes for leadership. His whole heart was to be centered on Jesus, and our Lord, noting this supreme attachment, made him a "bosom-disciple." The disciple, in his later years, referred to himself as "whom Jesus loved." His Gospel and all breathe a deeper spirituality, a more complete absorption and a higher degree of inspiration than those of other New Testament books. Wholly different the character of David. He was the soldier-king as well as the sweet singer. His love and his hate were both ardent. We find him in Psalm 139 "hating him with a perfect hatred"—the language untempered by moderation or forgiveness. It was the expression of human feeling like that of John, whose feelings were softened by personal contact with the Saviour, who taught us to forgive our enemies.

Mrs. R. H. G., Filer, Idaho. The Emperor is a member of the Lutheran church.

H. W., Bornholm, Ont., Canada. Statement is certainly not historical, although it may be current in diplomatic circles. If it were historical it would be widely known and edged.

W. C. M., Harrison, Ohio. 1. There are many warnings against false teaching in the Bible. See II Thess. 2: 3; Matt. 24: 24; subsequent verses; Mark 13: 5, 6; Luke 21: 34; Mark 13: 22, 23. Such warnings are given through the Scriptures. 2. The sect mentioned is not recognized by orthodox Christians.

G. W. S., Winchester, Ohio. The rite of baptism, except in cases of sickness or sudden death, preventing attendance in church, is usually administered in public, in presence of the congregation. It is a very special opportunity of acknowledging our spiritual allegiance to the world, and of signaling our entrance into the visible church as members of the household of faith.

J. U. A., Seattle, Wash. 1. We believe in a revival Sunday to be a thoroughly sincere work for souls. 2. The woman mentioned in Rev. 17 is interpreted by commentators as representing the whole apostate church, Roman, Greek and even Protestant, in so far as it has been away from its "first love" to Christ, the heavenly Bridegroom, and given its affection to worldly pomp and idols.

R. K., Harwarden, Iowa. Before law Moses was delivered to the children of Israel, they were a vast tribe of nomads, governed by patriarchal laws, which had been known from the beginning of their race and which persisted through the power of natural relationship. The time had come for their transition from the condition of a tribe to nationhood, with a place in the world's history and duties accordingly.

W. J. McC., White Rock, Pa. II Chron. 22 and II Kings 8: 26, relative to the reign of Ahaziah began to reign, are explained by commentators on the ground that "according to the first passage, his reign began in the first year of the kingdom of his mother, when he himself was twenty-two years of age. This is the explanation furnished by the translators. It is not made clear in the translation but is the only presumption available by way of explanation.

F. D., Oklahoma. Marriage is first mentioned in Gen. 2: 18 and can therefore be said in certain sense to be of divine origin. It is also verse 24 of the same chapter, where many passages in Scripture commend the married state, and the only instance where it is discouraged are where it has been considered inexpedient for sufficient reasons. (Matt. 19 and I Cor. 7.) Early in the history of the world, as shown in several passages, Read Prov. 2: 17; Prov. 5: 18; Isa. 54: 1; Prov. 12: 4; 18: 22; 19: 14; 31: 11-13; Heb. 13: 4.

Mrs. F. C. L., Portland, Ore. The assurance of I Peter 4: 6 must not be interpreted in the sense of implying a second probationary preaching to those who have already died from life. The text says "for this purpose the Gospel preached also to them that are dead." It was as though the apostle had said: "It was preached to many now and they were yet alive: the antediluvians, the patriarchs, the Israelites in the Old Testament. Peter is here referring only to those who have been brought within reach of the Gospel who knew God through the preaching of ministers in Old and New Testament times."

ONE of the first naval encounters of the present war was that between the German auxiliary cruiser Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse and the British cruiser Highflyer, in which the former was sunk off the West African coast and the crew taken prisoners. From a reader in Ottawa, Ohio, the Christian Herald has received a most interesting communication, containing copies of several letters written by the first engineer of the Kaiser Wilhelm, relating what befell the crew after the battle, and how they are faring in captivity. It is explained that much that was of a personal nature has been eliminated from these letters, but the narrative is largely retained.

The first of the letters, which is dated more than a month after the beginning of the war, is as follows:

"KINGSTON, JAMAICA, September 13.

"I am not dead, as you may have supposed, but a prisoner of war on the island of Jamaica. On August 2, Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse was made auxiliary cruiser of the navy. On August 4 we left Bremerhaven to wait for orders in the North Sea. At 5 P.M. we received orders to leave, and to disturb English merchant traffic on the Atlantic, in order to attract English cruisers to the South Atlantic. As the English Channel was already blocked, we went north to Iceland and Greenland and then south to the Azores and to the Canary Islands. All we caught on the way was the Grimsby fishing steamer Tubal Cain. The ship was destroyed after the crew was taken aboard. South of the Isle of Faroe we met the English steamer Galician; but as she had women and children on board we could not do anything to her, and we let her go after we had destroyed her wireless. Then we met a large meat steamer, Capaira, and destroyed her, after having taken her crew on board. Then we met the Alonza, a ship like the Grosser Kurfürst, having several thousands of passengers on board. We had no use for her either, as there were too many women and children, and so we only made her throw her wireless apparatus overboard.

"Finally we met the cargo steamer Nyanca. She also was destroyed by us after having taken her crew aboard. Altogether, we had 123 English prisoners and had to make a neutral station for coaling. For that purpose we went to Rio de Oro, on the west coast of Africa. We arrived there August 17, but not until the 25th did our two coal steamers come—the Hamburg-American liner Bethania, and the Oldenburg Portuguese liner Urucas—and we started coaling at once. Our ship was at anchor half a mile from shore and we had our boilers going only at half speed. The next day at noon came the English cruiser Highflyer. A whole fleet had been searching for us for a week. The Highflyer requested our commander to surrender. 'A German warship never does such a thing,' our commander answered; and so the fight began. As our boilers were still going at half speed there was no chance for us to escape; our commander gave the order that all men, except the artillery, should board the coal steamers. So 400 men boarded the Bethania and about 100 men the Urucas, and only about fifty men were left on the Kaiser to man the guns. We prepared to sink our ship, so that it might not fall into the hands of the enemy. I was the last man to leave the ship, after having opened the bottom valves in order to sink it. I escaped through a porthole—there wasn't time to reach the decks. Fortunately, I caught the Bethania, which was steaming away to get out of danger, but I had to swim hard to do it.

"As the Highflyer gave all her attention to the short combat which followed, we escaped westward and made up our mind to reach North America if possible—as neutral land. All went well until we were about 300 miles off the Charleston coast, when accidentally we met the English cruiser Essex, which made us prisoners and brought us to Kingston, Jamaica, September 10.

"We are treated here according to our rank, I must say, more generously than I expected; but we had to leave the Kaiser without any clothes and without any money to buy any, although the English Government does not object to our either receiving or buying clothes. There are 399 men from the Kaiser, besides myself, who have nothing at all and are utterly destitute.

"October 17.

"I want to pray you not to oblige me any more than you did already, because it might be impossible to pay reward to you. On account of being a naval officer, I receive some pay while in prison (I did not know this when I wrote to you before) that is quite sufficient for the little things I need for comfort. Food we get aplenty; water and climate are healthy. What more do we want? The only thing which I do not feel quite comfortable about is the fact that I have to share a room with eighteen others who do not always talk common sense nor show always a No. 1 manners. But war is war; and being a prisoner of war, I have to be satisfied as it is.

"November 8.

"We got some more comrades today, and our little house is rather crowded, which makes it disagreeable. I wish the war was over, for I am longing for the occupation I am accustomed to. Can't you prophesy how much longer I will have to stand it?

"If I could daily climb up the hill I can see from our quarters, it would be a great pleasure to me; but I can only look at it. Our garden is successful—we have harvested radishes already. If there is no chance for engineering after the war, I shall go to America and cultivate some land.

"And now enough today. I wish I had my favorite poet here today—Fritz Reuter—to cheer me up a little; but he is resting at the bottom of the sea—like so many other things. Fool that I was to have so many things on board!

"November 25.

"It is getting cooler now, in consequence of the rains. We are preparing for Christmas. One of us plays the piano, another the violin, and so we play and sing our German Christmas songs so far away from home. Another Christmas far away from home!

"They are all well at home and good care is taken of everybody, so that they don't notice the war at all.

"O. W."

The First Guarantee

We were the first to make cotton hose good enough to definitely guarantee the wear.

We guarantee six pairs to wear six months without holes.

If any of the six pairs fail in that time you are given new

THE MIRACLE AT MOUNDVILLE

BY EARL E. DUDDING

[Fourth and final instalment of this story of an ex-convict and what came of his imprisonment.]

HIRAM REILLY was a negro
"lifer." He had been in the penitentiary twelve years. He was rated as one of the most unmanageable men there. Once I expressed my determination to get Hiram to take the Christian Herald. The captain of the guard heard my remark and laughed, saying, "If you can get Hiram Reilly to subscribe to the Christian Herald I'll buy two subscriptions myself." I took him up. And that night I went to see Hiram Reilly. Walking up to his cell, I said: "Hello, Hiram."
He answered: "How comes you so familiar with me?" I replied: "I call you to police court enough to know what your name is." I went on and told him about the Christian Herald, and how I wanted him to subscribe for it. Instead of getting angry with me, as I expected, he said: "You're the fellow that was talking to Sam Vineyard?" I said
"Yes." He replied, "He tells me it's a pretty good paper. I'll just take it."
I was a little bit surprised, but I replied, "Fine, Hiram. You and I are going to be friends from now on. I'm an old hardened sinner, just as you are, and have a pretty stiff sentence before me; but I have some influence and if you will help me we will all join together and live as good as the people outside. Quit scrapping with these officers and step down at the office any time you want to talk with me."

He braced up, showed his teeth in an old-time smile and I went away with his subscription signed up. I showed his handwriting to the captain of the guard, who recognized it. The captain was as good as his word. He became a subscriber to the Christian Herald, and sent an additional subscription to his sweetheart. That was one result.
The other was that Hiram Reilly got out of wearing stripes, and has never had them on since! He is wearing first-grade clothes; he belongs to the Bible class and the choir; he is on the lockout and he has today as many privileges as I had when I was in the penitentiary! Yet he had been one of the worst men in the jail!

was no holding them once they the habit of reading the paper.
Christian Herald arrived la-would almost mob me. "You Christian Herald man," they say, "and it's up to you to get one."
And so the years dragged a gradually increasing leaven o-ness in the midst of the mis-was the atmosphere of the
And slowly, ever so slowly the days passed, I presently aware of another misery which gendered by prison life, not with walls, but without. One by one approached by convicts, some of short-timers, some of them life-asking me to use my influence their families who had been deof their support when they entered the jail.

Thus was revealed one of the injustices of our modern penal system, unavoidable, no doubt, but cruel in its effects.

When a man enters upon a term in prison, not only is the man pushed, but his family, by that very act, is punished as well. I talked with men who, separated from their families by the law, had no idea how these families were being supported during their incarceration. A prison sentence sometimes means the complete break-up of a household. Children scattered or sent into institutions; women compelled to labor for their bread in ways to which they had not been used before the disgrace fell upon them.
"Won't you try to do something for the old woman and the kids?" was the burden of many an importunity which came my way before I was released.
And I resolved that I would do everything possible to help them.

My thought, then, was simple for the families of the men who had appealed to me. But after I left Mound-ville Penitentiary, and became acquainted with instances of poverty and privation endured day after day by poor women and children whose husbands and fathers were wearing prison stripes, I found an opportunity to continue in my small way the work which had begun behind prison walls.

When I left Moundville, I found that the friends who had said "oddy" to me so sorrowfully years before were waiting to greet me, quite appropos. Of course, my story was the topic of the day in Huntington, and I had many offers to go into business in one way or another. It seemed, however, as though the routine of the prison and the misery that I had encountered there had erased all desire for commercial preferment. I supposed it was because I had had a taste of the joy of helping one's fellow man, and I wanted to continue the work if possible. The idea of doing something for the destitute wives and families of men incarcerated in the penitentiaries took strong possession of me. I became enthusiastic over it, and as enthusiasm is usually contagious, it was not long before I had a number of offers from friends who desired to work with me.
We formed ourselves into a little group of willing workers, and from this nucleus grew the Prisoners' Relief Society of today. What that society is doing has been partly told in the Christian Herald. Suffice it to say that we have succeeded in lifting some of the burden of misery from wives and children of convicts in a number of prisons throughout the country, and shall continue to do so to the utmost of our ability.

Relief Society was organized in June,

Huntington papers, such as the Huntington Advertiser, the Huntington Herald-Dispatch, etc., the editors of which have first-hand knowledge of the work the society is doing. It also has the endorsement of the Ministerial Association of Huntington, W. Va., which association, in a series of resolutions, resolved: "That we, the Ministerial Association of Huntington, W. Va., do heartily endorse the Prisoner's Relief Society and pledge our influence to its advancement."

The Christian Herald has received letters commending Mr. Dudding and his work from the following:

Warden M. L. Brown, under whose auspices the penitentiary at Moundsville underwent so much moral and physical improvement; John S. Marcum, who was employed by the relatives of his uncle to prosecute Dudding; Jean F. Smith, the state's attorney, who prosecuted him; Judge John T. Graham, who defended him at the trial; R. S. Douthat, court stenographer at the trial; Dr. C. M. Crouch, who attended his injuries after the fight with his uncle; Floyd S. Chapman, mayor of Huntington; P. C. Buffington, sheriff of the county in which he was convicted, and others.

The Prisoners' Relief Society has received some contributions for its work and has aided a number of worthy but destitute families of prisoners. Its work is not confined to the prisoners at Moundsville, but is being gradually extended with the idea of covering the whole country.

that hath endured such gainsaying of sinners against themselves. . . . Who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising shame, and hath sat down at the right hand of the throne of God." Is your service difficult, must you endure hardness? Consider him who endured the cross, the ultimate hardness. Is your service difficult, must you be careful not to be ashamed? Consider him who despised shame. Never forget the rest, "And sat down at the right hand of the throne of God." "Remember Jesus Christ, risen!"

Where is God? "Remember Jesus Christ, risen!" Why does God permit this war today? "Remember Jesus Christ, risen!" Why did God permit the Cross? In that Cross his government and goodness were challenged. In that Cross his government and goodness were vindicated. "Remember Jesus Christ, risen!" But Christianity has failed; all its precepts are trampled in the dust! What then? "Remember Jesus Christ, risen!" Did he fail? Through suffering and weakness and all that made him contemptible, he won his victory. That is the story to the end.

It is a curious thing that when I searched my New Testament to find some man in the days of Jesus who was a dilettante, fooling, I could not find one. When Jesus passes by in any guise or garb, he forces superlativeness, and there is no man in all the story who was fooling! Men today who do not see that the day of the Lord is at hand, and who do not drop into line somewhere, ready to suffer and die; for them there is no comfort in this.

But to the man, the woman, who faces the problem, the distress, the darkness; and then buckles on the armor and goes by way of the Cross; I say to such: "Remember Jesus Christ, risen!"

This is due to generous responses from the Chinese themselves and to liberal gifts from abroad. Our latest information is that no further assistance is needed. Rev. C. E. A Little Acme Quality Paint, Enamel and Varnish and there you are

WHEN a family moves into a new house all freshly decorated, there is a distinct uplift felt by everyone. It is just like beginning over again on a higher level of living.

But we can't all move or build new houses every year, though things do grow shabby and family life gets into a rut. But everyone can occasionally put a new room in the old home, and the new room will act like a tonic. It will give a new zest, renewed pleasure in the home. New rooms can readily be put in old houses with

ACME QUALITY Paints and Finishes

There is an Acme Quality finish for every surface. Floors, baseboards, window sills, stairs and all such surfaces are made beautifully bright and new with Acme Quality Varnish.

Acme Quality White Enamel is a perfect finish where white woodwork is wanted, in living rooms, dining rooms, kitchen or bathrooms, and it is just the thing for enameling odd pieces of furniture.

But first write for the Acme books—"Home Decorating" and "Acme Quality Painting Guide." These will tell you exactly what you need for any kind of surface and how to use it.

We will tell you the name of the nearest Acme dealer, who will be glad to advise with you on what you are planning. Acme Quality Finishes come in cans from 1/4 pint up, ready prepared to use. They are easy to use and the results are invariably delightful. The books are free for the asking. A post card will bring them.

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is a reproach to any people." Prov. 14: 34.
There is something wrong with a man who does not love his fatherland:

"Lives there a man with soul so dead,
Who never to himself has said:
This is my own, my native land?"

The Hebrew race preferred Jerusalem to their chief joy, and in captivity refused to sing the Lord's song, hanging their harps upon the willows and weeping as they remembered Zion. Our Lord set the supreme example of patriotism when he wept over the doomed city, and bore her on his heart as he trod the Via Dolorosa. Because we love the land on which our eyes have rested at birth and shall rest last in death, we want to see her exalted. "It shall come to pass in the latter days that the mountain of the Lord's host (i. e., Mount Zion) shall be exalted above the hills and nations that flow into it." Why? Because her people shall be all righteous, and they shall beat their swords into plowshares! Let us strive to increase the righteousness of our national life, first, by the nobility of our own character and example; second, by our pure and holy influence; and third, by getting as much of our Lord's legislation as possible registered on her statute books.

Review Suggestions

By Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts

AGAIN we suggest that Review Day shall be a Nature Review of the season in the beginners' class (under 8); Decision Day in classes whose members are from 8, the age of legal responsibility, to 15, the age of decision for a greater number now in the church than any other; and Vocation Day for those from 16 to 21 years of age; and a Citizenship Review of God's Newest Testament for those who have reached or passed 21.

Decision Day

The spring is a picture of revival and regeneration, when the latent life of the barren trees springs into flower and fruit. Spring is a new birth to the seemingly dead plants. As the north wind blows away the fogs, and the south wind gently woos slumbering life into useful service for man, so God's convicting and converting Spirit awakens our dormant powers to life and love and liberty. "Heaven is near in the valley of decision." A Christian life is more beautiful, more natural, more useful, than an un-Christian life.

In the lessons of the quarter we have two types of conversion in Samuel and Samson. In Samuel we see a sample of those whose first choice is right, those who hear God's first call, and give their whole life to him. That is the way it should be with all who have good parents as he did. But Samson, though he had good parents and in a rough way helped God in his youth, represents those who, having fallen into great sin, come back and renew their consecration and die for God and their fellow men at last. His story should encourage the old and sinful to come into "the valley of decision." God says to the very chiefs of sinners: "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out."

Vocation Day

The lessons of this quarter fit very well into the suggestion of the Presbyterian Church, which others might well adopt, that a special day should be set apart as "Vocation Day," when all young people who are nearing the portals of manhood should ask, "What does God call me to be?" That is the meaning of "vocation"—a call. And that, of course, is the meaning of the word "calling" as the synonym of occupation. God calls us by the capacities he gives us and the opportunities that confront us. Let every one put with the question, "Who made you?" that other question, "What for?" God made Joseph to be a leader, and showed him plainly that was what he was for. Moses also was called loudly and plainly to leadership. Some are called to be humble followers. "They also serve who only stand and wait." In the lessons of this quarter we have two typical calls of boys and men in Samuel and Gideon; of girls and women in Deborah and Ruth. Gideon's call was to danger, to revolution, to battle against great odds; to clean his own town, and also to overthrow his country's foes. Samuel's call was to a quiet ministry as both priest and judge. It took no less courage than that of the battlefield to carry to Eli, the high priest, God's condemnation of his failure as a father in training his sons and the prophecy of the retribution to follow. Ruth represents woman called to home life; Deborah, the maiden queen, called to public service. Today it takes more courage than that of soldiers, in many cases, for a popular and educated young man to choose the work of the ministry or of the missionary, from which so many strong men have turned away for money or fame, "disobedient to the heavenly vision." Young men of noble instincts, God-given, should be challenged to push aside the allurements of wealth for the harder but grander tasks of evangelism and social betterment.

Christian Citizenship Review

For the two millions in men's classes Review Day is the fitting time to review the revelation of God's power in the civic events of the quarter. As in a megaphone God is saying great things to the world through the thunder of the siege guns and the undertone of heart-breaking sobs. Such things as these the war has already said to those who have ears to hear:

No nation liveth or dieth to itself. If one member suffer, all members suffer with it. The race is one. We rise or fall together.

The mightiest thing this side of the throne of God is the power of public sentiment. That is the meaning of the effort of all warring nations to justify their course to neutrals. More than ever we must seek to enlighten this new "world power" of public sentiment.

Autocracy and militarism must go. "War is the trade of barbarians!" Alcohol is the foe of efficiency.

This is the supreme compensatory message of the war thus far, that it is proclaimed to the world in tones like the roar of the new British howitzers, that vodka and absinthe and even wine and beer are the enemies of efficiency among soldiers and of economy and harmony among civilians. France has passed a prohibitory law for its worst drink, absinthe, applying not only to France itself but in all its colonies. And the nation's political leader says it is but the beginning of the nation's war on all intoxicants. Great Britain has sounded a warning. The German emperor's advocacy of abstinence before the war has now taken form in some war orders, not yet adequate. But Russia's nation-wide prohibition has become the eighth wonder of the world, saving more money than the great war costs, so that savings bank deposits have greatly increased; saving more lives than are being lost in this unspeakable twentieth century war. The prohibition, decreed at first for three months and only for the saloons of the poor, and later extended to all drinks for all classes, has now been extended beyond the war as a fixed policy because of the vast improvement speedily wrought in the appearance and conduct both of individuals and in communities. The latest news is that jail-building has been stopped, which is the negative side of the picture, with the increase of savings banks as its positive.

These European recognitions of the evil of the liquor traffic and the value of prohibition are reinforcing our American campaigns for state-wide and nation-wide prohibition to such an extent that the nations at war on both sides have become our "allies" in our war on the saloon. It is easier to prophecy when our anti-alcohol war will end than when the European war will end. "A saloonless nation in 1920" has become not merely a hope but a probability—almost a certainty.

The writer has been touring the forty-two legislatures in session this year. Nearly all of them are either strengthening the enforcement of the prohibition they have already enacted or increased the range of local planning for state-wide prohibition.

After the fashion of the war reports from Europe, let us review our recent "gains." About a year ago we had eight states under state-wide probi-bition: Maine, Kansas, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Mississippi, Georgia, North Carolina, Tennessee. In about a year's time we have added Virginia,
West Virginia, Colorado, Washington, Oregon, Arizona and Alabama—the latter significant as a return to the fold of the only Southern prohibition state that ever relapsed. Besides the fifteen states there are eight states whose congressmen unanimously opine they are coming into line soon, for their delegates voted solid for probi-bition when the majority vote was cast recently in Congress: Arkansas, Florida, Idaho, Montana, South Carolina, South Dakota, Vermont, Wyoming. That makes twenty-three white states in sight. Add the states not now under prohibition, a majority of whose congressmen voted prohibition:
Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Michigan, Missouri and Pennsylvania, and we have twenty-nine states of the thirty-six needed to carry the constitutional amendment. There are indeed thirty-four already, a majority of whose people have voted for some form of prohibition, local, county or state-wide.
We may well make it our marching song with the two million members of men's Bible classes leading the chorus:
"It's a short way to prohibition!"

Making the Best of Poor Material

By Amos R. Wells

IT IS well that this quarter's lessons begin with one on God's patience with all his people, for it must have been sorely tried during this period; yes, and all through Israel's history, as Stephen said in his dying speech. "A tree," writes Rev.
J. Reid Howatt, "may grow straight for a time, and then, somehow, take a twist; after that, however, it may grow straight up again. So some people may be good, and yet be overtaken in some fault, as the tree was with the storm that twisted it; but the wish of the tree was to rise straight.
Through all his failing God may see a wish to be his, even in the one who has yielded to some temptation, and so he is patient, patient—so very patient." Thus God was patient with his sinning people, and so we also should be patient with all sinners, and with the tedious progress of the right.
"Never be discouraged," George Macdonald advises us, "because good things get on so slowly here. Enter into the sublime patience of the Lord."

The next thing to notice in this quarter's lessons is the prominence of women—Deborah, Ruth, Delilah and Hannah. One bad woman and three good, one hinderer and three helpers in the onward movement of the nation. "Consideration for women," said Gregoire, "is the measure of a nation's progress in social life." Evidently Israel was far ahead of the nations around it, since so much is made of women in its earliest history.

Note the heroic element in these early Hebrew chronicles. Gideon dared meet a world of enemies alone.
Samson was entirely willing to perish, so that his country's foes might perish with him. Samuel dared difficult obedience even when a boy. Saul shamed his people into meeting the Ammonites and rescuing their fellow countrymen. Heroism, as we see in all these examples, consists in forgetting self in the zeal for service. We see it in the splendid close of the journal kept by Captain Scott as he and his fellow explorers starved to death in the Antarctic. Those last words had no thought for himself, no regret for the too early close of his strong young life; only praise for his companions, and an expression of confidence that England would not fail to care for the families dependent on them.

These Bible heroes, however, had to be summoned loudly to their tasks, every one of them except the vain-glorious Samson. Deborah had to prod Barak. Gideon was enlisted by an angel. Samuel was called by the voice of the Lord. Saul was solemnly set apart by Samuel. There are no self-made men in the kingdom of God.
"Life," says J. M. Barrie, "is a long lesson in humility." Some men are just like an old Englishwoman who was deaf, but insisted on joining in the solo of the anthems. The minister of the church was asked to request her to sing only in the hymns. He shouted in her ear, "Betty, I've been asked to speak to you about your singing!"
With much difficulty she at last caught the word "singing," and replied, "Not to me be the praise, sir; it's a 'gift.'"
Such are the self-complacent, self-nominating men who deem themselves strongest when they are weakest, and think they are adequate for any task.
But the modest Bible heroes wait for the divine call, unmistakably pronounced.

But how many flaws there were in these noble men! God had to be very patient with them as well as with the people. Barak was sluggish, unenterprising. Gideon was over-cautious, at least in the start. Samson was licentious and careless. Eli was heedless of his sons, and over-indulgent. Samuel made the same great mistake. Saul was headstrong and obstinate. Yet in spite of their faults these men did a great work. They were like a minister who, when a phrenologist told him he lacked reverence and so should not be a minister, answered that that was the very reason why he should be a minister; "because," said he, "if I overcome this fault, I shall be better able to help others overcome their faults."
Every inner battle we win helps us to win an outward battle for some one else.

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

THREE HUNDRED years of Israel's history have emphasized for all time some eternal truths of sorrow and mercy. The Oriental mind finds no difficulty in recognizing the hand of God in afflictions for sin and in this attitude the dwellers in Syria—Jew, Christian and Moslem—are nearer to the Biblical truth than the people of the West.

We have a devout neighbor, a woman who often works in our house. When the war broke out she felt so deeply the connection of sin and sorrow that she vowed daily attendance till God's mercy shall put an end to the awful sorrow involved. And to see that woman rising at early dawn and going through cold and rain to keep her vow has been a sermon to us all.

I met a Druze Emir—a feudal prince of ancient family—a few days ago. I told him some of our sayings about war, and he graphically described it as "the sword in God's hand punishing us for our sins." It rang like the words of the prophets who recognized that the issues of every battle were in his hands and giving the lie to Napoleon's sneer that God was always on the side of the big battalions.

In all the Christian churches of Syria—Greek, Maronite, and Roman Catholic—the priests have for months been preaching the war as punishment for our sins with the necessity of a return to him seeking mercy and forgiveness.

WITH AND WITHOUT A GARDEN

LAST spring, in May to be exact, fortune favored me with a two days' automobile tour which covered a fair portion of the map between New York and Boston via dozens of dear old Connecticut towns.

The weather was perfect; the country beautiful; all the expected delights of autoing in the heyday of the year! But one unlooked-for thing made an especially bright picture in the memory of that trip; the charm of even the plainest and oldest and smallest houses and barns—in out-of-the-way places no less than on the high road.

Everywhere were yellow forsythia and sweet syringa radiant in bloom. Here and there a blossom-laden fruit tree transformed some little dooryard into a small Garden of Eden. By the side of stately country house and humble cottage alike nodded the lilacs; great, purple, fragrant masses of them; while tulips and hyacinths, in prim, precise rows to many a garden gate, tempted us to open the latch and walk in.

And we passed the old homestead which a friend of mine had left to a caretaker soon after her grandfather died, and she built for herself an up-to-date house in the city near by. We had heard it could be bought for $3,500. We stopped before it and fairly gasped. "Thirty-five hundred for the most adorable little rambling farmhouse that one could imagine, with flowers in front and in back and on all sides of it, and a fascinating vegetable garden in the bargain?" Why, that was fairly giving it away! One of our party declared he would buy it in another year. But there was small chance it would be on the market that long; it was altogether too attractive! A bargain, indeed, with a capital B!

In October I was asked to take the same trip again. The friend who had coveted possession of the old Thomas homestead wanted to go out and look it over; this time with the keys and a permit to go inside.

The weather was perfect; the country beautiful; all the expected delights of autoing in the fall of the year! But one looked-for thing was not. "When," I wondered, "would we come to them; all those fine houses and love-in-a-cottage places that belonged to this part of the country?"

There were plenty of attractive houses, to be sure; but then there always are attractive houses wherever you go, and these were no different from any others on any other ride—certainly not to be compared with those we had run across on the same roads six months before! Moreover, we did pass no end of places that stood woefully in need of the painter and carpenter.

Then the truth began to dawn on us. It was all the reckless profusion of the spring blossoms that had made this country such a paradise of charming homes when we last saw it. The newly-raked gardens; the blooming, sweet-smelling bushes by the sides of the houses and the flowering vines that climbed over their porches, which had atoned for the sins of the architect or neglect of the landlord, and had made us envy the householder of even the humblest home.

Today we saw those houses in all their uninteresting sameness, and oft-times naked ugliness. And one and all of that automobile party resolved that when he or she bought the house in the country—of which every normal city-house man and woman dreams—it would have one thing above all else; a garden. For my part, two-fifths house and three-fifths garden—even though the invited guest must sleep perforce on the living room couch!

About that house of the Thomases, did you ask? Why, the price they wanted for it was simply exorbitant. In the clear light of October we looked it critically over and marveled at the impudence of asking $3,500 for—well, if Josephine Thomas seriously hopes to sell the place she had better talk to prospective buyers only in the spring time. A fool and his money might conceivably be parted there on a May day, with the fragrance of the lilacs deadening cold reason; or in June when the glory of the crimson ramblers blinded one to the cheerlessness of the rooms within. Certainly no one who saw it for the first time without these exterior decorations would have courage to attempt anything with the interior. But, to change the subject, let me ask you a question:

When spring comes this year how is your home going to look to your family, and to your neighbors, and to the public who pass by?

Just like other peoples' houses? Catalogues are ready; send for one; seeds are cheap; "now's the time!" Grow something!

VIRGINIA EARLE.

A BIT O' SHAMROCK

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

"SHURE, don't you know what it is?" asked the Little Old Lady. "It can't be that you don't know!" She lifted the sprig of greenness to her nose and sniffed it as if searching for a half-imaginary, wholly delightful fragrance. "Why, it's a bit of shamrock—shamrock from the old country."

The Girl looked at the withered hand with its neat white cuff and slender, heavily blue-veined wrist. She saw the ring-finger with its dull, heavy band of gold, the spot of vivid color that outlined itself, clover-like, on the palm.

"A bit of shamrock!" she mused. "A bit of shamrock!"

"'Tis on it the fairies are dancing this night," murmured the Little Old Lady, "and my heart is with them there."

The Girl started. Some time ago there had been fairies, but they were make-believe fairies, carefully sandwiched between the pages of her long-discarded story books.

"The fairies?" she questioned. "Real fairies?" Her voice held a surprised wonder—a polite unbelief. "Surely you don't mean it?" she asked.

"Shurely I do!" ejaculated the Little Old Lady. "Why, I've noticed them myself. It's often I've noticed them. They dance on the green, and it's the little shamrocks they love better than any flower—the little shamrocks that are as green as God's grass and trees, that are shaped like a kiss from the wind that blows over the heather. It's many times they've come to me!"

The Girl looked across the dim twilight-filled room. Somehow, her eyes smiled softly into the shadows.

"Just how have you happened to notice them—the fairies?" she asked.

The Little Old Lady put a small finger to her lips in a meditative, strangely childlike way.

"Why, it's not aisy to explain," she murmured. "Dear child! They come different ways, different ways altogether. Sometimes I thought it was a string o' sunbeams dancin' on the floor—sometimes I thought it was a light breeze playin' on the wee grasses. But I always, always knew soon that it was the fairies!"

The Girl gasped wonderingly. "You always knew it was the fairies?" she questioned. "You always knew? Do you mean that you—saw them?"

A slow deprecating smile spread itself, dreamlike, over the wrinkled

CHILDREN SHOWED IT

Effect of Their Warm Drink in the Morning.

"A year ago I was a wreck from freebinking and was on the point of giving up my position in the school room because of nervousness.

"I was telling a friend about it and he said, 'We drink nothing at meal time but Postum, and it is such a comfort to have something we can enjoy inking with the children.'

"I was astonished that she would allow children to drink any kind of freebut she said Postum was not freebut a most healthful drink for children as well as for older ones, and at the condition of both the children and adults showed that to be a fact.

"I was in despair and determined to give Postum a trial, following the directions carefully. It was a decided success and I was completely won by its delicious flavour.

"In short time I noticed a decided improvement in my condition and kept growing better month after month, until I am healthy, and do my work in the school room with ease and ease. I would not return to nerve-straining coffee for any money."

Nae given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Well-being," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms: Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 1 lb. at 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. tea-souful dissolves quickly in a cup of water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 1 lb. at 50c tins.

Both kinds are equally delicious and cost for cup about the same.

face, as the Little Old Lady gazed a bit wistfully at the shamrock in her hand.

"Well, it's never exactly that I've seen them," she said slowly, "but shure I've felt them!" her voice was triumphant.

The Girl was plainly startled. How, she wondered, could one feel a fairy? Some way, in her most utterly believing child days, she had never felt one—actually felt one.

"Did they—touch you?" she asked abruptly.

The Little Old Lady laughed delightedly and beamed through her thick glasses at the Girl.

"They never exactly touched me," she admitted; "but, darlin', my soul felt them. . . . I knew they'd been in the room, the blessed little people, for somehow I'd find my spirits up in the air, and my heart, that had, maybe, been heavy-like, a singin' hymns. I'd feel clear-headed, and healthier, and more sweet, so I'd know they'd touched me!"

The Girl pouted. (She had a charming mouth that pouted kissingly.) Two big question marks glowed menacingly in her soft eyes.

"But if," she ejaculated, "but if you have felt them, why haven't I? If they've come to you in sunbeams or summer winds, why haven't they come to me? If they've kissed your soul, why haven't they helped me when I've been low-spirited and sad? I've never seen one." Her voice was plaintive.

The Little Old Lady reached out a small hand that was scarred with toil-marks, toil-marks that were veiled dimly by a host of years. She touched the Girl gently on the arm.

"Shure, dear," she murmured, "you can't expect to see them—it was in the old country that they used to visit me. They kissed my tears away when Johnny died, and softened the hurt when my little girl sailed over the ocean. It was in the old country! Here . . . why, here you don't believe and hope—you haven't time! A sunbeam's only a sunbeam, and a breeze is only a breeze. The shadow of their wings is only a bit o' dust, and the sound of their singin' is only a troublesome noise in your brain. Why, child, here you haven't got a fairy ring that they could dance on; you've put tall buildings and streets and cars over them, and built subways under them. You're too busy hurrying after work, and money, and fame, to stop for their whisper. And when perhaps you've earned the right to rest, your heart is too old and wrinkled to know the feel of their hands. Shure, dear, you haven't time for the little people."

The purple shadows fell softly over the Girl's face as she sat with drooping eyes, and the Little Old Lady sighed as if the wind of her homeland was playing through her mind. The small room was strangely still—strangely filled with peace.

Suddenly the Little Old Lady spoke, while her eyes looked tenderly at the bit of shamrock that drooped on the palm of her hand. "Green it is!" she murmured, "like all of God's growing things—" All at once she laughed gently at a pretty little thought. "Child," she half whispered, "do we ever, when we see the growing things, thank God enough? We should thank him every day that he didn't make the trees or the grass red, or purple, or orange. Think of our eyes if we couldn't rest them like with the deepness, or the freshness, or the softness of the green! Do we ever thank him enough?"

The Girl visualized a world tinted, like a cubist picture, in orange, or purple, or red. Suddenly a convulsive shudder swept across her shoulders and she eyed, very thankfully, the sprig of healthy, wholesome, romance-tinted greenness on the withered palm. "A bit of shamrock!" she mused, "and in the old country the fairies are dancing on a ring of them—"

The Little Old Lady, under cover of the shadows, raised the small leaf to her lips. "And me heart is dancin' with them," she sighed. Her voice was gentle—but a bit husky.

Fortified Tires
With All-Weather Treads or Smooth
No-Rim Cut-Tires—"On-Air" Cured

Now in the Light

Goodyear tires have for years loomed up as the biggest thing in Tiredom. And they loom up bigger each year.

Last year men bought about one Goodyear for every car in use. That proves beyond question—does it not?—that Goodyears average best.

Goodyear Fortified Tires have five great features found in no other tire. These combat these six chief troubles in the best ways known.

Rim-Cuts Insecurity
Blowouts Punctures
Loose Treads Skidding

We spend millions of dollars to give you these protections. One of them—our "On-Air" cure—costs us $450,000 yearly.

That's why Goodyears rule. They are super-tires. Men who adopt them find contentment, and they stay.

Lower Prices. On February 1st we made our third great price reduction in two years. The three total 45 per cent.

That is largely the result of our mammoth production. It enables us to give you greater value than was ever known before in a tire.

Try them, in fairness to yourself. Any dealer will supply you.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

MRS. S. W. L. writes from Wooster, Ohio: "I wish to acknowledge answer to prayer in restoration of sight to a son." A Friend writes to acknowledge answer to prayer for a formerly drunken brother. He has not taken liquor for about three months. A Reader from Virginia writes: "My heart has been made very happy of late. God has heard and answered my prayer and saved a very dear friend's soul." L. T. writes, expressing thanks for relief from a financial burden: "The dear Lord has heard our petitions and the relief has been more abundant than we could have hoped or asked."

A Friend from New Jersey writes: "Last October I wrote you regarding my wife who had been afflicted with a mental delusion. A few weeks later she improved very markedly both mentally and physically, but a most torturing fear of disaster still clings to her, robbing her of peace of mind and greatly limiting her sleep. I write to ask you to join with me in gratitude for what God has done and asking that if it can be his will the fear may be taken away and natural sleep restored."

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have also been received from H. P., Little Bethel Homestead, Catlin, Ohio; Mrs. V. T. P., San Augustine, Texas; J. W. I., Los Angeles, Calif.; Mrs. M. D. H., North Scituate, R. I.; Mrs. O., Charlotte Hall, Md.; Mrs. R. P. R., Chamber, Ga.; H. L. R., Columbus, Ohio; A Reader; Mrs. H. R., Monroe, Wis.; Mrs. E. N., Meridian, Miss.; Mrs. F. E. G., Bowling Green, Ky.

Here is perhaps the saddest letter ever addressed to the Prayer League. Will not all the members of the league give it their most heartfelt attention and unite in earnest prayer that this friend may be saved from his despair? "Please pray for me that I may not commit suicide. I am in terrible fear of committing that sin. My condition comes from sins of my youth, and physical breakdown, with nervousness and depression, self always to the front and rebellion towards God. I am conscious of the fact that I deserve no sympathy from God nor man but yearn for sympathy with unutterable longing. I feel that my condition means the loss of my soul hereafter, and neither peace of mind nor comfort of body in this life. Please pray also for my son. He is wayward, and my sins are visited upon him. Please pardon this selfish letter, and beg God to forgive and save. I have no faith, and an awful fear of insanity and eternal punishment. Yours in unspeakable distress."

A special letter is being sent to our brother urging him to an immediate trust in God. He writes that he has no faith, but he must have had some faith or he would not have asked our prayers. We shall hope to have good news from him soon.

Mrs. V. T. P. asks prayers for the healing of her mother who suffers great bodily agony, and whom physicians have failed to relieve. She writes: "I know it is through God's power alone that we shall get relief."

A husband and wife ask prayer that the wife's sister, together with her husband, may be reconciled to them, bringing to an end an estrangement of some years' standing. They also ask prayer for the conversion of these dear ones, and that all jealousies and misunderstandings may be removed. Prayers are asked, in view of the added perils which endanger the lives of those who "go down to the sea in ships," that the men and women who are employed on these vessels may be saved from disaster. A friend asks prayer for a loved one and friend who are undertaking a perilous journey, that they may safely reach their destination.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at Cuba, Ala.; Modesto, Calif. (special union meetings to begin on April 1—that many may be converted early in the meeting); West Scituate, R. I.; M. E. Church at Branchville, N. J.; Mackford Prairie Church at Markesan, Wis.; Lott, Texas; Farina, Ill.; Corning, Calif.; Mt. Mitchell M. E. Church, Withersville, Va.; North Wilbraham, Mass.; Parkton, Md.; Chillicothe, Mo.; Dunkerton, Iowa; Fayetteville, Ga.; Ash Ridge Baptist Church, Gillingham, Wis.

(special help for the minister during these times); Cincinnati, Ohio (for a rival, at that every home there may be tied into Bible home); F. W. M. asks prayer for the mission at Abingdon Square, New York City. Miss A. asks prayer that a mini—may found for the Presbyterian church at Chillicothe, Mo.; prayers are asked for guidance of the Holy Spirit upon a congress on deciding whether or not to call a w pastor. Prayers are asked that a church Parkton, Md., may receive financial aid for needed repairs. "In His Name" asks prayer that a may be opened for work in the temperance crusade or in connection with a Bible school religious publishing house; also that the work of the W. C. T. U. may be blessed and enlarged.

Twenty-six friends ask prayer for the mental restoration or strengthening of relatives, friends, or themselves, including one that the mind of a brother may be restored, and another that a Sunday school teacher's mind may be restored.

A subscriber asks prayer for her husband's sight may be restored; Mrs. M. A., her mother's; Mrs. E. S. L. M., and A. S. K., the daughter; E. D., that sight of son may be restored. Eight friends ask prayer for restoration or strengthening of sight for other relatives and friends.

Seventeen friends ask prayer for relatives or friends may be saved from the liquor habit. A wife asks that her husband may be cured of the morphine habit; two friends ask that a son may be cured of the drug habit; daughter; another, that a brother may be cured of the morphine habit; woman, that she herself may be cured of the morphine habit; another asks prayer that a boy, also a woman, her husband and three sons may be cured of the drug habit.

Forty-four friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in our words their desire for personal blessing, including one who writes: "Please pray that I may return to the Fold."

Thirty parents ask prayer for conversion of sons.

Seventeen wives ask prayer for the conversion of their husbands.

Forty-nine friends ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives and friends, including one that brother may be saved and that he may find happiness in his home.

Twelve readers ask prayer for a special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

One husband asks prayer for the healing of his wife; twelve wives for the healing of their husbands; sixteen parents for the healing of their children, including one that daughter, who may be straightened and healed, and another that daughter who has never spoken a word may be able to talk; seventeen parents for the healing of sons, including one that son may more perfectly gain the power of speech, another that son may gain the use of limbs, and another that son's back may be straightened and that he regain the use of limbs; fifteen friends for the healing of themselves, including two who request prayer for regaining the use of limbs, and one that he may be able to walk without crutches; sixty-nine for the healing of other relatives or friends, including one for the recovery of a brother from blood poisoning.

Ninety-nine friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires, including one that sister may be saved from her son who left home; that home life may be happier; other that "we may have a new home in our old days"; that husband and self may be reconciled to each other and live together; another, "that I may be reconciled to a loved one"; another, "that a wife, long estranged, may be reconciled; another that 'I may be forgiven for a mistake I made in return of peace of mind'; and another that a husband and wife may be reconciled; another that means found to pay for operation of brother and sister sadly need.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

Some Mission Opportunities That Summon Us

Endeavor Topic for March 28. Ezek. 34: 20-31

When talking with a church official the other day who bewailed the fact that the Home Missions Board of his denomination failed to "feel" of the Great West, I said, "It is hard to get the needed wisdom for work like this without coming into first-hand contact with its people and its conditions." I gave over the notes on the Epworth League topic for this same date, and by Mr. and Mrs. Jenness, I was struck by a strange thrill, caused, I knew, by the fact that in writing about Indians they were writing about people whom they had lived and for whom they had worked. So Dan Crawford wrote about Africa. So Samuel May wrote about his "bums." The church and its leaders must "get" to the people whom they are to help. In the city slums the architecture of the churches is repelling rather than attractive. Many city blocks the church on the corner is in the one dark, gloomy building. The church ought to be a place of light and gladness and freedom of helpfulness every day and all day. Outside our city populations, which take the larger share of our million immigrants every year, there are Indians and negroes (read the Epworth League notes below), the unheeded districts of the West and the Pacific coast, and—a big group of people to whom we owe a special debt which is almost wholly ignored by the church.

The world is coming to us. America is the "Melting Pot." A ring-change comes to Christian workers to act aggressively, skillfully, with inspiration and self-sacrifice to bring out the pure gold of the character from this bubbling mass. Lead, give, pray, think, talk; fulfill the task lying at your door, this you may do for the farmers, the laborers, the miners, the sick, the prisoners in your town or county. If possible, go where the field is neediest; there the richest rewards.

Enlarged Missionary Ideals

P. U. Topic for March 28. Eph. 1: 12. Conquest meeting

Why we make our missionary ideas bigger?
I am trying to grasp the magnitude of the world's population—about four hundred millions, India's two hundred and thirty-two millions, Africa's one hundred and eighty millions, the world's one billion seven hundred and thirty-two million. These are big figures. Yet we may have a real part in reaching and saving and blessing some of this vast multitude.

(2) By realizing how deep is the world's need of salvation.

(3) By realizing the completeness and power of the salvation of Jesus for the souls, the minds and bodies of the world.

(4) By realizing the splendor and power of the blessing he offers to each of us individually to equip us for our part in these great tasks.

(5) By realizing the nobility and grandeur of the sacrifices already made by missionary heroes of the past and present and by longing to measure up to the standards they have set.

(6) By realizing the completeness of the surrender Christ wants us to make to him and to his cause of saving the world.

Our Nation's Wards: or a White Man's Chance for Red Men and Black Men

Epworth League Topic for March 28. Ex. 12: 49; Deut. 10: 19; Acts 17: 26-28; Luke 4: 18, 19

READ some of the newspaper accounts of the recent unexpected Indian uprisings in the West. We can hardly blame the Indians for feeling resentful when they consider their treatment at the hands of the white man. The United States Government's treatment of the Indians makes one of the darkest pages in our history. All that we can do for them in the future can scarcely atone for our wrongs to them in the past. But we must do what we can to give those who remain of this subjugated race a "white man's chance." Indian schools, such as the Carlisle School in Pennsylvania and the Sheldon Jackson School in Sitka, Alaska, are doing great work. Home missionaries are bringing the Gospel to the reservations. Some members of the race are making noble records in the nation's life and work.

More has been done for the negro, but much remains to be done. The work of the Freedman's Aid Society brings education and the Gospel to the descendants of the slaves of long ago. We must support the work with our gifts. And we must let Christ's love in our hearts make us thoughtful, courteous, truly helpful to all the members of this brother-race, remembering that skin color has nothing to do with the worth of souls and with God's desire that every life shall have opportunities for happiness and achievement.

LAST SURVIVOR OF THE MONITOR

LIVING, hale and hearty, is the last of the heroic band that met the Merrimac and defeated her on March 9, 1862. His name is William Durst. When Lieutenant John L. Worden was wounded it was Durst that caught him and carried him to safety. He says, "It was a battle that was fought from eight in the morning till two in the afternoon of a beautiful Sunday. Then the Merrimac with sprung sides was made to retire. Worden was badly hurt as he stood at the turret looking out of the eyehole; a Merrimac shell exploded right before his eyes making him temporarily blind. His wounds were severe but not fatal. Some on the Merrimac bled from mouth, nose, and ears from the cannonading of the Monitor, which steamed proudly away after the encounter. She was practically unhurt."

When the "Yankee cheesebox on a raft," as the Monitor was called, sank in a wind-storm when en route to Beaufort, N. C., four officers and many men were drowned. The loss was great, but the Monitor had demonstrated the value of armored vessels for warfare on the seas. Durst's picture shows him in full uniform as he was clad when on board the Monitor.

sighed, her face growing wistful again. "This isn't going to last, you know. It can't. Summer boarders don't. I've got to do something winters. I've been thinking. I believe—I'll write stories."

Jamie turned with a start. "You'll—what?" he demanded. "Write stories—to sell, you know. You needn't look so surprised! Lots of folks do that. I knew two girls in Germany who did."

"Did you ever try it?" Jamie spoke a little queerly.

"N-no; not yet," admitted Pollyanna. Then, defensively, in answer to the expression on his face, she bridled: "I told you I was keeping summer boarders now. I can't do both at once."

"Of course not!" She threw him a reproachful glance. "You don't think I can ever do it?" "I didn't say so."

"No; but you look it. I don't see why I can't. It isn't like singing. You don't have to have a voice for it. And it isn't like an instrument that you have to learn how to play."

"I think it is—a little—like that." Jamie's voice was low. His eyes were turned away.

"How? What do you mean? Why, Jamie, just a pencil and paper, so—that isn't like learning to play the piano or violin!"

There was a moment's silence. Then came the answer, still in that low, diffident voice; still with the eyes turned away.

"The instrument that you play on, Pollyanna, will be the great heart of the world; and to me that seems the most wonderful instrument of all—to learn. Under your touch, if you are skilful, it will respond with smiles or tears, as you will."

Pollyanna drew a tremulous sigh. Her eyes grew wet.

"Oh, Jamie, how beautifully you do put things—always! I never thought of it that way. But it's so, isn't it? How I would love to do it! Maybe I couldn't do—all that. But I've read stories in the magazines, lots of them. Seems as if I could write some like those, anyway. I love to tell stories. I'm always repeating those you tell, and I always laugh and cry, too, just as I do when you tell them."

Jamie turned quickly. "Do they make you laugh and cry, Pollyanna—really?" There was a curious eagerness in his voice.

"Of course they do, and you know it, Jamie. And they used to long ago, too, in the Public Garden. Nobody can tell stories like you, Jamie. You ought to be the one writing stories; not I. And say, Jamie, why don't you? You could do it lovely, I know!"

There was no answer. Jamie, apparently, did not hear; perhaps because he called, at that instant, to a chipmunk that was scurrying through the bushes near by.

It was not always with Jamie, nor yet with Mrs. Carew and Sadie Dean, that Pollyanna had delightful talks and walks, however; very often it was with Jimmy, or John Pendleton.

Pollyanna was sure now that she had never before known John Pendleton. The old taciturn moroseness seemed entirely gone since they came to camp. He rowed and swam and fished and tramped with fully as much enthusiasm as did Jimmy himself, and with almost as much vigor. Around the campfire at night he quite rivaled Jamie with his story telling of adventures, both laughable and thrilling, that had befallen him in his foreign travels.

"In the 'Desert of Sarah,' Nancy used to call it," laughed Pollyanna one night, as she joined the rest in begging for a story.

Better than all this, however, in Pollyanna's opinion, were the times when John Pendleton, with her alone, talked of her mother as he used to know her and love her in the days long gone. That he did so talk with her was a joy to Pollyanna, but a great surprise, too: for never in the past had John Pendleton talked so freely of the girl whom he had so loved—hopelessly. Perhaps John Pendleton himself felt some of the surprise, for once he said to Pollyanna, musingly:

"I wonder why I am talking to you like this?"

"Oh, but I love to have you," breathed Pollyanna.

"Yes, I know—but I wouldn't think I would do it. It must be, though, that it's because you are so like her, as I knew her. You are very like your mother, my dear."

"Why, I thought my mother was beautiful!" cried Pollyanna, in unconcealed amazement.

John Pendleton smiled quizzically.

"She was, my dear."

Pollyanna looked still more amazed. "Then I don't see how I can be like her!"

The man laughed outright. "Pollyanna, if some girls had said that, I—well, never mind what I'd say. You little witch!—you poor, homely little Pollyanna!"

Pollyanna flashed a genuinely distressed reproof straight into the man's merry eyes.

"Please, Mr. Pendleton, don't look like that, and don't tease me—about that. I'd so love to be beautiful—though of course it sounds silly to say it. And I have a mirror, you know."

"Then I advise you to look in it—when you're talking sometime," observed the man sententiously.

Pollyanna's eyes grew wide open. "Why, that's just what Jimmy said," she cried.

"Did he, indeed—the young rascal!" retorted John Pendleton, dryly. Then with one of the curiously abrupt changes of manner peculiar to him, he said, very low: "You have your mother's eyes and smile, Pollyanna; and to me you are—beautiful."

And Pollyanna, her eyes blinded with sudden hot tears, was silenced.

Dear as were these talks, however, they still were not quite like the talks with Jimmy, to Pollyanna. For that matter, she and Jimmy did not need to talk to be happy. Jimmy was always so comfortable, and comforting; whether they talked or not did not matter. Jimmy always understood. There was no pulling on her heart-strings for sympathy with Jimmy—Jimmy was delightfully big, and strong, and happy. Jimmy was not sorrowing for a long-lost nephew, nor pining for the loss of a boyhood sweetheart. Jimmy did not have to swing himself painfully about on a pair of crutches—all of which was so hard to see, and know, and think of. With Jimmy one could be just glad, and happy, and free. Jimmy was such a dear! He always rested one so—did Jimmy!

Zealous in Good Works

WHEN Corona, N. Y., was a small colony the late Charles P. Leverich, then president of the Bank of New York, founded the Union Evangelical Church of Corona with the proviso that the church building was forever to be union, and the seats forever free. A third of a century ago, Rev. William Jay Peck (Congregationalist) became its pastor. He holds the record of one of the longest continuous pastorates in the city. He tells of the building up and decay of many churches. His ministry has been a very active one. During the third of a century over six thousand children have been on the rolls of the Sabbath school, of which Mr. C. D. Leverich, son of the founder, is now the honored superintendent at seventy-five years of age. Dr. Peck has baptized during these years 1,379 persons, received into church membership 734, married 676 couples and officiated at 1,103 funerals. The mother Union Church has a promising descendant. At North Corona the work has been expanding till the original four in Mr. J. Carlins' Sunday school became nearly three hundred and a new, Second Union church will be ready for dedication in February, costing 12,000. Twenty denominations and as many nationalities are represented in the work. Dr. Peck has traveled much and given many lectures on countries visited. He has been a correspondent of the Christian Herald for nearly twenty years.

WHAT IS AN INTERNAL BATH?

By R. W. BEAL

MUCH has been said and volumes have been written, describing at length the many kinds of baths civilized man has indulged in from time to time. Every possible resource of the human mind has been brought into play to fashion new methods of bathing, but strange as it may seem, the most important as well as the most beneficial of all baths, the "Internal Bath," has been given little thought. The reason for this is probably due to the fact that few people seem to realize the tremendous part that internal bathing plays in the acquiring and maintaining of health.

If you were to ask a dozen people to define an internal bath, you would have as many different definitions and the probability is that not one of them would be correct. To avoid any misconception as to what constitutes an internal bath, let it be said that a hot water enema is no more an internal bath than a bill of fare is a dinner.

If it were possible and agreeable to take the great mass of thinking people to witness an average post mortem, the sights they would see and the things they would learn would prove of such lasting benefit and impress them so profoundly that further argument in favor of internal bathing would be unnecessary to convince them. Unfortunately, however, it is not possible to do this, profitable as such an experience would doubtless prove to be. There is, then, only one other way to get this information into their hands and that is by acquainting them with such knowledge as will enable them to appreciate the value of this long-sought-for health-producing necessity.

Few people realize what a very little thing is necessary sometimes to improve their physical condition. Also, they have almost no conception of how little carelessness, indifference or neglect can be the fundamental cause of the most virulent disease. For instance, that universal disorder from which almost all humanity is suffering, known as "constipation," "auto-intoxication," "auto-infection," and a multitude of other terms, is not only curable but preventable through the consistent practice of internal bathing.

How many people realize that normal functioning of the bowels and a clean intestinal tract make it impossible to become sick? "Man of today is only fifty per cent. efficient." Reduced to simple English this means that most men are trying to do a man's portion of work on half a man's power. This applies equally to women.

That it is impossible to continue to do this indefinitely must be apparent to all. Nature never intended the delicate human organism to be operated on a hundred per cent. overload. A machine could not stand this and not break down and the body certainly cannot do more than a machine. There is entirely too much unnecessary and avoidable sickness in the world.

How many people can you name, including yourself, who are physically vigorous, healthy and strong? The number is appallingly small.

It is not a complex matter to keep in condition, but it takes a little time, and in these strenuous days people have time to do everything else necessary for the attainment of happiness but the most essential thing of all that giving their bodies their proper care.

Would you believe that five minutes of time devoted to systematic internal bathing can make you feel and maintain your physical condition indefinitely? Granting that such a simple procedure as this will do what is claimed for it, is it not worth learning more about that which will accomplish this end? Internal bathing will do this and it will do it for people of all ages and in all conditions of health and disease.

People don't seem to realize, to say, how important it is to be body free from accumulated poisons (poisons). Their doing so prevents the absorption into the blood of the poisonous excretions of the body and health would be the inevitable result.

If you would keep your blood normal, your eyes clear, your complexion clean, your mind healthy, your blood pressure normal, your nerves relaxed, and be able to enjoy the youth in your declining years, internal bathing and begin today.

Now that your attention has been called to the importance of internal bathing, it may be that a number of questions will suggest themselves to your mind. You will probably want to know WHAT an Internal Bath is, WHY people should take them, and HOW to take them. These and countless other questions are all answered in the book entitled, "THE WHAT, THE WHY, AND THE WAY OF INTERNAL BATHING," written by Doctor Chas. A. Tyrrell, the inventor of the "B. L. Cascade," whose lifelong study and research along this line make him the pre-eminent authority on this subject. Not only has internal bathing saved and prolonged Dr. Tyrrell's own life, but the lives of a multitude of other individuals have been equally saved and prolonged. No book has ever been written containing such a vast amount of practical information to the housewife, the worker, and the business man, all that is necessary to secure the best results is to write to Dr. Chas. A. Tyrrell, Number 134 West 65th Street, New York City, and mention having read this article in The Christian Herald, and same will be immediately mailed to you free of cost or obligation.

Perhaps you realize now, more than ever, the truth of these statements, and if the reading of this article will result in a proper appreciation on your part of the value of internal bathing, it will have served its purpose. What you want to do now is to avail yourself of the opportunity for learning more about the subject, and your writing for this book will give you that information. Do not put off doing this, send for the book now while the offer is fresh in your mind.

"Procrastination is the thief of time." A thief is one who steals something. Don't allow procrastination to steal you out of your opportunity to get this valuable information which is being offered to you. If you would be healthy, it is unnatural to be sick. Why be unnatural, when it is such a simple thing to be well?—Admission.

My Corns

Wee Ended This Way

Unless women have told other women about Blue-jay plasters. Now a million corns are ended in this scientific way.

Women who know Blue-jay do not suffer corns. When one appears, they put a Blue-jay plaster on it. That ends the pain. In 4 hours the corn is gone forever, with no soreness left.

If you can't believe it, ask your friends. Half of them have probably ended corns with Blue-jay. If you still doubt it, ask for samples. Try them on corns of your own.

Don't coddle corns. Don't pare and keep them. Don't use old-time treatments. A famous chemist has made corns utterly unnecessary. That sort of torture is a thing of the past.

The Catholic Church and the Reformation

IT WILL doubtless be news to many that the Roman Catholic Church has already begun to make preparation for the approaching four hundredth anniversary of the Reformation, which will be celebrated in 1917. The Protestant world has been looking forward with interest to the coming of that year, and Protestants are now beginning to wonder what effect the present war will have upon the celebration. Meanwhile, the Roman Catholics have taken time by the forelock and are publishing literature calculated to fortify the minds of their people against any effect which such a Protestant celebration may have. The most important preparation of this sort which has been made so far is the publication of a Life of Martin Luther by the Jesuit historian, Hartmann Grisar. It is a bold attempt to discredit the whole Reformation movement by placing the most unfavorable construction upon the writings of Luther. With a pretense of perfect fairness, it woefully distorts the true historical picture of the great reformer, and thus interferes with an honest estimate of the work that he began.

In the interests of the truth it has long been desirable that the English-speaking public should have some means of checking the statements of the almost innumerable Luther biographers. None of us is quite ready to agree with those who would make Luther out to be a saint, and none of us is willing to credit all that the Roman biographers tell us about him; but it is only that small number of us who can go to the original languages in which he wrote that are able to form our own opinion of the man, the aims and purposes and motives that animated him in his revolt from Rome, and the ideas and ideals for which he stood.

We therefore welcome the announcement that this lack is shortly to be made up by the publication of a ten-volume translation of Luther's Works in English. The first volume is now in press and will present the earliest of Luther's more important writings, beginning with the year 1517. The second volume, which is to follow in a few months, will include the great writings of the year 1520. The work has been done with utmost care, and the selections have been so made as to offer examples of all the different kinds of treatises which came from the pen of this many-sided man. A group of five competent scholars is in charge of the work of translating and the advisory members of the committee include Professor Henry E. Jacobs of the Lutheran Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, who is well known as a Luther scholar and author of one of the best English biographies of the Reformer. The publishers are the A. J. Holman Company of Philadelphia.

By a New Way

"By a way that they knew not." Isa. 42: 16

THE day had gone, alone and weak
I groped my way within a bleak
And sunless land.
The path that led into the light
I could not find! In that dark night
God took my hand.

He led me, that I might not stray,
And brought me by a new, safe way
I had not known.
By waters still, through pastures green
I followed him—the path was clean
Of briar and stone.

The heavy darkness lost its strength,
My waiting eyes beheld, at length,
The streaking dawn.
On, safely on through sunrise glow
I walked, my hand in his, and lo,
The night had gone!

The Truth About Leather

In a recent defensive circular to the auto trade, leather manufacturers define leather as "the skin or hide of an animal, or any part of such skin or hide, tanned or otherwise prepared for use."

But since whole hides are too thick for upholstery and the under fleshy portion must be split away from the grain side to make it thin enough, why should the two or three sheets into which the wastage is split be called leather? Although artificially coated and embossed to look like real grain leather, they are weak, spongy, and soon crack, peel and rot.

is frankly artificial leather, guaranteed superior to coated splits. Its base is cotton fabric, twice as strong as the fleshy split. It is coated much heavier and embossed in the same way.

America's largest auto makers adopted it for upholstery because it outwears coated splits.

That foremost furniture maker, S. Karpen, says: "The cheap split leathers should be entirely eliminated in furniture upholstery."

Two-thirds of all "leather upholstery" is coated splits. Demand superior Fabrikoid on your car, buggy or furniture.

The test of a fire insurance policy is FIRE

Every fire tests the kind of service a company gives its policyholders, but the supreme test is the great conflagration that leaves a big city in ashes, forces many insurance companies out of business and makes policyholders all over the country anxious about the security back of their insurance.

At such times the man who holds a policy of the Hartford Fire Insurance Company never worries. He knows that his policy is backed by ample assets and more than a century's record for the prompt payment of every honest loss. He knows that the Hartford has stood impregnable through every great fire disaster that has visited this country, whether it meant paying $1,933,000 to Chicago in 1871 or $10,000,000 to San Francisco in 1906.

This is one of the reasons that the Hartford does today the largest fire insurance business in the United States. There are other reasons equally important. The Hartford agent in your town will be glad to explain further.

EASTER PRESENTS FROM THE HOLY LAND

WHEN the president of the Christian Herald visited the Holy Land last year he procured a number of special olive wood covers with which to bind the Pictorial Life of Christ, the Red Letter Bible and the Red Letter Testament, for such good friends as might wish to use them as Easter gifts. Naturally only a limited number of covers could be obtained, and these have been bound upon the volumes mentioned below and are now offered to any member of the Christian Herald Family who desires to obtain an especially unique and appropriate Easter gift.

This illustration is one-half the size of the Olive Wood Bible

The Pictorial Life of Christ illustrated with 82 magnificent photographs taken from the original wax and clay sculpture by the famous artist, Mastroianni. The text by the Rev. Ira S. Dodd tells the story of the life of Jesus in simple, attractive language. This volume will instantly attract attention wherever shown. Size 7 x 10 inches.

We will send you, postpaid, a copy of the Pictorial Life of Christ, bound in olive wood, and the Christian Herald for one full year for only $4.00. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, a copy of the book as a reward for sending us four new subscriptions to the Christian Herald, at $1.50 Each.

Red Letter Bible—Bound in Olive Wood

Authorized or King James Version unchanged. In the Old Testament the passages quoted by our Lord or directly related to incidents to which he refers are printed in red. In the New Testament the words universally accepted as those of the Saviour are printed in red. Contains full references, concordance, subject index, and dictionary, maps, etc.

We will send you, postpaid, a copy of the Red Letter Bible, bound in olive wood, and the Christian Herald for one full year for only $4.00. Or, we will send it to old subscribers FREE as a reward for sending us four new subscriptions to the Christian Herald at $1.50 each.

Red Letter Testament—Bound in Olive Wood

The words spoken by our Lord printed in red. Very clear type; red under gold edges; issued in both Authorized and Revised Version.

We will send you, postpaid, a copy of the Red Letter Testament, bound in olive wood, and the Christian Herald for one full year for only $2.50. Or, we will send it to old subscribers FREE as a reward for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald, together with $3.00.

BILLY SUNDAY ON THE ATONEMENT

An Evening Sermon Preached in the Philadelphia Tabernacle February 22

THIS is a lesson instead of a text. My sermon tonight is topical, not textual. The subject of it is "The Atoning Blood of Jesus Christ," the thing about which all else centers. I believe that more logical, illogical, idiotic, religious and irreligious arguments have been fought over that than all others. Now and then when a man gets a new idea of it, he goes and starts a new denomination. He has a perfect right to do this under the thirteenth amendment, but he doesn't stop here. He makes war on all of the other denominations that do not interpret as he does. Our denominations have multiplied by this method until it would give one brain fever to try to count them all, but I can name on the fingers of my two hands all of the denominations that believe in the atoning power of the blood of Jesus Christ as the only means of salvation, so at one sweep of the sword of the Spirit I have decapitated ninety per cent. of the others and swept them on the junk heap where they belong.

I have sometimes thought that Adam and Eve didn't understand as fully as we do when the Lord said: "Eat and you surely shall die!" They had never seen any one die. They might have thought it simply meant a separation from God. But no sooner had they eaten and seen their nakedness than they sought to cover themselves, and it is the same today. When man sees himself in his sins uncovered he tries philanthropy or culture. God looked through the fig leaves and the foliage and God walked out into the field and slew the beasts and took their skins and wrapped them around Adam and Eve, and from that day to tonight when a man has been a sinner and has covered himself it has been by and through faith in the shed blood of Jesus Christ.

Every Jew covered his sins and received pardon through the blood of the rams and bullocks and the doves. The reason God accepted Abel's sacrifice and rejected Cain's was because Abel offered his choice of his flocks, filled with the blood of life, while Cain gave only crops from the field.

An old infidel said to me once, "But I don't believe in atonement by blood. It doesn't come up to my ideas of what is right."

I said, "To perdition with you and your ideas of what is right. Do you think God is coming down here and consult you with your great intellect and wonderful brain, and find out what you think is right before he does it? My, but you make me sick! You think that because you don't believe it that it isn't true. Oh, mercy!"

He said, "But I can't believe that the innocent must suffer with the guilty; it isn't justice." Great God, man! We're not looking for justice; it's mercy we're crying for. If we'd had justice, we would have all been in hell long ago. As for your opinion, what does it amount to in the sight of God? Your opinion doesn't count anything with the laws of Pennsylvania. They're supreme. Men go to the penitentiary oftentimes because of a difference of opinion.

I have read a great deal—not everything, mind you, for a man would go "bughouse" if he tried to read everything—but I have read a great deal that has been written against the atonement from the infidel standpoint—Voltaire, Huxley, Spencer, Diderot, Volney, Bradlaugh, Paine, on down to Bob Ingersoll—and I have never found an argument that would stand the test of common sense and common reasoning. And if any one tells me he has tossed on the scrapheap the plan of atonement by blood, I say, "What have you to offer that is better?" And until they can show me something that is better I'll nail my hopes to the cross.

You say you don't believe in the innocent suffering for the guilty. Then I say to you, you haven't seen life as I have seen it up and down the country. The innocent suffer with the guilty. by the guilty and for the guilty. Look at that old mother waiting with a trembling heart for the son she has brought into the world. And see his mother prays and weeps the pillow with her tears over her godless boy. Who suffers more? The mother or that God-forsaken, whisky-soaked loafer of a boy? You have only to be the mother like that to know who suffers more. Then you won't say anything about the plan of redemption and Christ suffering for the guilty.

Look at the young wife, the man whose name she bears, and whose face is woven in the fabric of her heart. The man she loves, for him in fright, and when reeking from the stench of his marriage vows, arms of infamy, who suffers? That poor, dirty, triple extra and sin, marplot, God-forsaken who is so low down it would be a miracle of God to raise him to the level of total depravity? You have the wife of a husband like that, know whether the innocent suffer for the guilty or not.

So when you don't like the redemption because the innocent suffer with the guilty, I say you don't know what is going on. It's the plan of redemption.

From the fall of Adam down to tonight it has always been the rule that the innocent suffer with the guilty. It is the plan of all less you bring yourself to see an idiot, an imbecile, a fool, all four, and gross flattery at that.

Jesus gave his life on the cross for any who will believe. We're not redeemed by silver or gold. Jesus paid for it with his blood. A good hymnology and so-called theology preaches all about the clarification of the blood. I don't believe in that. I take the blood from the wounds of Jesus and wash my face with it. I take your clothes or mine if it will do.

When some one tells you that religion is a bloody religion, the Bible is a bloody book, tell them that Christianity is a bloody religion. The Gospel is a bloody Gospel, the Bible is a bloody Book, the plan of redemption is bloody. It is. You take the blood of Jesus Christ out of Christianity and it isn't worth the paper it is written on. It would be worth more than your body with the blood of Jesus. Take the blood of Jesus out and it would be a mere jargon and jumble of words.

When a man says to read good books, do good deeds, live a good life, you'll be saved, you'll be damned, the books in the world won't get you out of hell without the atonement of Jesus Christ. It's Jesus nothing for every sinner on earth.

Without it, not a sinner in Philadelphia ever will be saved. I paid for your sins with his blood. The doctrine of universal salvation is a lie. I wish every one would be saved, but they won't. You will never be saved if you reject the blood of Jesus Christ.

God hates sin. Sin is something you can't deny. You can't argue against sin. A skilful man can frame a man against the validity of the law, but he can't frame an argument against sin. If you are grounded in faith before you begin to read about infidelity, the chances are you'll begin to think unbelief is more reasonable than belief, and you will doubt.

You can argue against Jesus the Son of God. You can argue there being a heaven and a hell, but you can't argue against sin.

Some day he will withdraw from salvation. Then—God pity us! It's up to you—and you, and you, and you. What are you going to do about it? As for me and my household, we serve the Lord!

Lightness Can Be Combined With Strength

HUDSON PROVED IT

When light steel bridges took the place of stone, there came up the question of strength in them.

When steel buildings displaced solid masonry, the question arose again.

So in automobiles. The early high-grade Sixes weighed 4500 pounds. That overtax in tires and fuel barred the Six to most men. Now it is known that over-weight was a crudeness, a weakness in itself.

The Hudson Remedy

Howard E. Coffin, the great HUDSON engineer, long ago decided that lightness could be combined with strength. He displaced cast iron with aluminum. He adopted pressed steel. He re-designed a thousand parts to secure staunchness without weight. His hollow driving shaft illustrates one method of weight reduction.

Then he designed a small-bore, high-speed motor. That let him lighten a hundred parts because of the lesser shocks.

After four years of effort, the final result is this HUDSON for $1550. It weighs 2890 pounds, ready for the road. As compared with old-time Sixes, it has cut fuel and tire cost in two.

Excess Out-of-Date

The Light Six vogue started with this HUDSON. Now crude excess is distinctly out-of-date. The leading cars average hundreds of pounds less than last year. But the HUDSON, because of our years of refinements, is the lightest in its class—the lightest 7-passenger Six.

This year, if you pay between $1000 and $2000, you are pretty sure to want a Light Six. Your sole question is, "Which is the best Light Six?"

10,000 Men Say Hudson

Over 10,000 men chose the HUDSON. Half of them bought last year's model, and have driven it two seasons. Half bought this year's model. Together they have driven this car, perhaps, 25 million miles.

They have proved it right. They have found no weakness, no shortcoming. Any owner around you will say that.

That's the all-important point. Every old-time standard has been radically revised in creating the Light Six. And only time and tests can demonstrate the avoidance of mistakes.

The HUDSON has met those tests. It is a proved success. Its buyers take no chances. It is, in addition, a Howard E. Coffin model. It is a finished product, showing the results of four years of refinement. We believe that you'll select it.

HUDSON Six-40 Seven-Passenger Phaeton, $1550, f. o. b. Detroit. Four other styles of bodies.

The HUDSON Company never loses interest in the cars it sells. So long as a car is in service we maintain our interest in the character of its service. That's one great reason for HUDSON reputation.

THREE FAMOUS MEDITERRANEAN ISLANDS

A CONTINUATION OF THE NEW TRAVEL SERIES IN PAUL'S FOOTSTEPS

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

OUR journey with the apostle Paul today takes us to the great island of Crete and the smaller but no less important islands of Rhodes and Malta (all of which have been brought into prominence by the European war). Neither the captain of the Alexandrian corn-ship on which Paul with his soldr guards and his companions, Luke and Aristarchus, embarked at Myra, nor the prisoners, nor any of the other passengers probably expected to set foot on Crete or Malta when they sailed, for they doubtless intended to make a straight course for Italy before the stormy winter season should make traveling dangerous.

But God evidently wished Paul to visit these important islands and spread in them the knowledge of his Son. Even the tempest and shipwreck accomplish his pleasure, "stormy winds fulfilling his word."

The first land that would greet the eager eyes of the passengers after leaving Myra would be the famous island of Rhodes, illustrious alike in ancient and medieval history. Many travelers still touch at Rhodes on their way in or out of the Aegean, and no more safe or beautiful harbor or more charming scenes greet the eyes in any voyage than Rhodes affords. That mighty statue, the Colossus of Rhodes, which once towered 106 feet above the harbor, though not bestriding it as some have thought, had long been in ruins even in St. Paul's day. The captain of the corn-ship, however, did not avail himself of this safe haven, but sailed on until he sighted the long, narrow island of Crete, which stretches through four degrees of latitude directly south of Greece.

This island, in modern as well as ancient times, has been a bone of contention between nations. The enterprising Phoenicians from Sidon established their colonies there. Greeks and Romans and Turks have fought for its possession, and only within very recent times, since the settlement of the war between the Turks and the Balkan allies, has the island come into the secure possession of the Greeks without the shadow of Turkish suzerainty. For years the great Powers maintained the tenuous claims of Turkey, and I remember, on one occasion when I was in Athens, what excitement was produced when the Cretan delegates to Parliament, who had stolen away from their island without the knowledge of the Powers, presented themselves for admission to the Grecian House of Representatives. The Greeks themselves were then obliged to refuse the deputies, though elected by the people of Crete to this office, but now the island seems to be under the permanent rule of Greece.

On the extreme southern point of Crete is a roadstead—it cannot be called a harbor—which now, as nineteen hundred years ago, was called Fair Havens, but which seems to belie its pleasant-sounding name, for it was scarcely a fair or safe place for a vessel to ride out the winter storms. However, for some reason, Paul's grain ship seems to have spent some time there until the approach of severe winter weather made it less dangerous to remain than to proceed. So far as we know there was no town at Fair Havens, but Luke tells us that it was nigh unto the city of Lasea.

If we should journey five miles east of Fair Havens we should find the ruins of an ancient city—heavy stones upon the shore, the remains of the foundations of great buildings, or perhaps piers proved upon. For terse, graphic, nervous language, language which presents an unforgettable picture to the reader's mind, I would refer him unhesitatingly to the original story.

"When we were escaped," says the writer at the conclusion of his account of the shipwreck, "then we knew that the island was called Melita." The ancient name is but little changed to-day, for the island is none other than Malta, the great stronghold of the British fleet in the mid-Mediterranean. Owing to the long occupation of the British, this island has more of an Anglo-Saxon air, and one feels more as though he were among his "own folks" than in any of the other cities connected with the apostle's life and labors. Here the language of business is English, though Italian is spoken in the law courts; here we find pounds, shillings and pence instead of piastres and mejidiehs. The pound sterling has something of an Italian sound, as it is called by the natives the "lira sterlina," while the shilling is a "scellino" and the penny a "soldo," though worth twice as much as the soldo of Italy.

In spite of the veneer of English civilization, the island is really far more Oriental than British. Out of the more than 200,000 inhabitants only 10,000 are English or foreigners, and the language spoken by the common people is nearly related to the Arabic. The terrible winds which prevail at some seasons of the year keep the island treeless, though it was once well wooded, and at first sight it looks barren and forbidding indeed, a mere rocky outpost of Britain's mighty naval power, as with seven-league boots she strides around the world.

But when one goes ashore he finds the island far from barren and unfruitful. As the Dutch and Danes have conquered the natural difficulties of their soil and have made their countries smiling gardens of the north; as the Swiss have turned their rocky, forbidding mountain fastnesses into the playgrounds of Europe; so the enterprising Maltese, perhaps because of the difficulties in their way, have made their apparently sterile island into one of the most luxuriantly fertile in all the seven seas.

Valetta is the chief port of the island today, and is a compact and enterprising little city of some 30,000 inhabitants, with one of the finest harbors in the world. It is situated on a promontory and is connected by a narrow neck of land with the island, while on every side the blue sea laves its shores, and twice a day fills the little bays on either side which run far up into the deeply indented shore. Landing at the quay we must climb at once to get into the heart of the city, sometimes by long flights of steps. The influence of British rule is evident on every side, not only in the great fort of St. Elmo and the other forts which guard the harbor at every point, not only in the dock yards and the hospitals and the public buildings, but we notice it in the unusual cleanliness of the streets, a distinction which cannot be accorded today to most of the other cities of St. Paul that we have visited.

The deep bay on the northwestern coast of the island where the sailors ran the fated corn-ship stretching out into the waters. Farther inland we should find other remains, and the people in the vicinity would tell us that the name of the place was Lasea, doubtless the same city of which Luke speaks.

WHETHER our prisoner spent few or many days there we do not know. Probably he went ashore with his soldier guard ever at his side, and proclaimed there the good tidings in Lasea. After considerable delay the captain of the ship disregarded Paul's advice and started on the voyage which was to be so disastrous to his vessel, but so memorable in the life of the apostle.

So many times and with so much evidence and circumstantial detail has the story of the shipwreck been told that I shall not attempt another description. Though told in detail thousands of times, the account as recorded by St. Luke in the twenty-seventh chapter of Acts has never been im-ashore is now called St. Paul's Bay, and it has been identified beyond a reasonable doubt with the scene of the shipwreck. Here the centurion commanded those who could swim to get ashore as best they could, while the rest, "some on planks, and some on other things from the ship," escaped safe to land. The minutest incidents of the voyage and the shipwreck have been verified by careful scholars, and even the English sailing directions have been drawn upon to prove that, with her anchors out, St. Paul's corn-ship could have withstood the furious winds of that terrible night, for these directions say that the ground in St. Paul's Bay is "so good that while the cables hold there is no danger, as the anchors will never start."

Here on this hospitable island the apostle and his companions stayed for three months until the winter winds had spent their fury and they could safely sail for Italy in another ship. One or two incidents which occurred in connection with the apostle's life on this island made a deep impression, not only upon the people who witnessed them, but upon Christians of all subsequent ages.

Grown people, no less than children, like to picture to themselves that scene on the shore of St. Paul's Bay when the great man, who afterwards gave it his name, ever active and desirous of making himself useful, gathered a bundle of sticks and laid them on the fire on that chill rainy day on which they escaped the perils of the sea. We can see the crawling viper sting the work-worn hand of the apostle; we can hear the superstitious barbarians whispering among themselves, as they saw the venomous snake hanging from his arm, "This man must be a murderer; though the gods allowed him to get ashore they are still upon his track to avenge his foul deed." They knew that he was a prisoner, and their surmise was not an unnatural one, but when they saw him calmly shake off the serpent into the fire and no harm come to him they concluded with much relief of mind that he was not a murderer but a god.

Once before, in front of the temple at Lystra, Paul had been hailed as a god, and doubtless, as on that occasion, he took the opportunity to declare that he was no deity, but the servant of Jesus Christ. Perhaps this gave him his first opportunity to preach the Gospel to these islanders, who apparently knew nothing of the new religion. Soon after this he had the privilege of curing of fever and dysentery the father of Publius, the chief man of the island, by prayer and the laying on of hands. Then came others to test his miraculous power, and his reputation, not only as a miracle worker but as the servant of the most high God, was so firmly established that he was honored with many honors, and when he sailed again he had "many gifts from the islanders of such things as he needed."

I have seen exactly the same change in the attitude of a Turkish village, wrought in these later days by a medical missionary, who by his healing skill had changed the hostile, ugly attitude of a whole town in a single day to one of admiration and kindness, while the hands that a few hours had hurled stones at us now brought presents as tokens of their good will.

The place where Publius, the chief man of the island in St. Paul's day, lived is thought to be Città Vecchia, the ancient capital. It lies near the center of the island, about midway between Valet and St. Paul's Bay, and is connected with Valet by a railroad. Here every turn reminds us of St. Paul. The principal square is called Piazza San Paolo, and here we find a fine cathedral which is said to be built on the very site of the house of Publius. Entering the cathedral, we see a great image of St. Paul, covered with a silver cloth, a reminder, by contrast, perhaps, of how little of that precious metal he was possessed of in his lifetime. In a suburb of Città Vecchia is another dedicated to St. Paul and named for him, which the inhabitants devoutly believe is built over the very grotto in which he lived during his three months on the island, and the catacombs the grotto are also called after his name.

I must not forget to mention one striking monument to the apostle which reminds every passing traveler of this wonderful story. In the bay of St. Paul is a tiny island called Selmun, and on this island is a towering statue of the apostle, which can be seen from far, a fit emblem of the colossal character which in all the ages since has so influenced and blessed the world.

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

THE political situation abroad has become so acute during the week that a glance at that situation will perhaps be interesting. Since the bombardment of the Dardanelles began the English, French and Russian papers and publicists are devoting much time and attention to the international problems which will result from the opening of the straits, particularly as to their effect upon the relations of the Allies.

Assuming as is most probable that the Dardanelles are forced and Constantinople taken by the armies of the Allies, the political situation which will result will be at once one of the most interesting as affects the continuation of a working understanding between the Allies, the most dangerous of the war, so far.

Since the day of Peter the Great, the possession of Constantinople and the Dardanelles has been the great and continuous aim of Russian foreign policy. For generations she has worked consistently toward that end, in nowise discouraged at the various mischances which have attended her efforts; for more than once the goal has seemed within her grasp, only to be withdrawn. For military and naval purposes, and commercial as well, Russia must have access to the Mediterranean, and never can she be a really great nation until that ambition is realized. Now, it appears impossible for England and France to allow Russia to possess herself of Constantinople permanently, for many reasons, some common to all these countries and some of individual concern only.

One common reason is that England and France both have subject to their rule millions of Moslems, and as Russia has always been regarded by the Moslems as the chief enemy of their religion the allowance by these powers of Russian possession of Constantinople would arouse a strong and perilous resentment among their Mohammedan subjects. Again, it would bring a third partner, and one whose claims could not be disregarded, into the control of the Mediterranean lake.

The present alliance between England and France, on one side of the Dardanelles, and Russia, on the other, cannot for many reasons be a permanent one, and hence Russia, established in possession of one of possess herself of Constantinople is the religious one, and a religious realm in Russia is potent, since the vast majority of the Russian population is devotedly attached to the Orthodox Church, to which church Constantinople is the holy city, as Mecca is to the Moslems, or Rome to the Catholics. Is it, therefore, probable that instead of the possession of this holy city, peculiarly important to her, and in general strategic and economic importance one of the most valuable sites in the world, Russia will be satisfied with a mere right of passage through the Dardanelles and a membership, one of five or six, in an international commission charged with the government of the town?

Furthermore, how will this solution of the problem be viewed by Greece, Rumania and Bulgaria? Would it satisfy them, or would it satisfy Italy even?

In Greece, a cabinet crisis occurred as a result of a conflict between the prime minister on the one side and the king and the general staff of the Greek army on the other, over the question of the immediate entrance of Greece into the war, a policy favored by the prime minister. The result has been the resignation of Premier Venizelos and his cabinet, and the constitution of another ministry under the premiership of Mr. Gounaris, whose policy is announced to be one of unswerving neutrality. As the new ministry cannot probably command a majority in the Boule, the Greek parliament, that body no doubt will the strongest points in the Mediterranean, growing as she is more rapidly than the other two in population and with enormous resources untouched which in the coming years will be exploited and with, moreover, an insupportable hunger for more and more territory—Russia, among all the powers of the world, is the most dangerous to the future peace of England and France and to their future plans in the present war.

Egypt, the Suez Canal, the French colonies on the north African shore, Malta and Gibraltar, would all be within easy striking distance of Russia, if she were strongly established on the Bosphorus, while India could be attacked by her from two sides.

Remember, too, that in addition to the other reasons why Russia is so anxious to be dissolved and an appeal made to the country. In Bulgaria a somewhat similar episode has taken place, and for identical reasons, and has resulted in the fall of a ministry of pro-ally sympathies and the creation of a new one, which has not yet announced its policy. May contradictory rumors continue to reach us as to the ultimate action of both Rumania and Italy in regard to participation in the war, but there is absolutely no credible evidence as to their future course.

The German submarine campaign, which had been inactive for some ten days began again in the last days of the week. On March 9 four British merchant steamers were sunk at such widely separated points as near Liverpool, St. George's Channel, near Scarborough on the Yorkshire coast, off Hasings on the south coast, and in the Channel well over to the French coast. Two days later the British auxiliary cruiser Bayano was sunk off the west coast of Scotland, only 26 of her crew of 212 being rescued. The Bayano sank with three or four minutes after being torpedoed. The German Admiralty has been advised that twelve submarines are missing, eight of them being of the new types; only two of these are known to have been sunk, and in one case the whole crew and in the other a part of the crew were made British prisoners and were refused the honors of war and sequestered apart from other prisoners pending a decision on the part of the British Admiralty where they shall be tried on criminal charges.

Other naval news is that a North German Lloyd, the Prinz Eitel Friedrich, which has been for some months playing the part of an auxiliary cruiser, put into Newport News the last of the week for repairs, which cannot, it is said, be made within the time allowed to belligerent vessels to remain in a neutral port, so her ultimate course is uncertain. This vessel had a number of prisoners on board, taken from ships recently sunk by her, and these, if non-combatants, in the event of internment will be paroled and released.

Along the vessels so sunk was an American ship, the W. P. Frye, of Bath, Me., whose wheat cargo the German commander considered contraband. This occurrence may have the effect of bringing a head the moot question whether wheat and other foodstuffs presumably intended for a civilian population can be treated as contraband of war. In the event that the sinking of the Frye is determined to have been a violation of our neutrality, the German Government will be expected to pay for the hull and cargo and make whatever other amends such an act calls for. All the crew of the Frye were saved by the German vessel.

The bombardment of the Dardanelles has continued steadily during the week except where weather conditions made such work impossible. The allied fleet appears so far to have penetrated the straits about fifteen miles, and has met with so stubborn resistance that the actual progress during the week has been very little, not much over a mile. The forts at the beginning of the Narrows have not been silenced, and their guns are replying incessantly to the allied attack. There is little reliability to be placed at present in reports of damage to either forts or ships, as such reports are always overestimated by the one side and understated by the other for obvious reasons.

The British admiralty, during the week, stated that it did not expect the forcing of the straits to be accomplished before the middle or end of April. The aviators who are acting as range-finders for the fleet have suffered considerably, we are told by London advices. As these lines are written the fighting is taking place near the entrance to the Narrows between the fleet and the force called Chawak on the Asiatic side and Kilid-Baha and Namazieh on the European.

As to the reports of panic in Constantinople, they may be true, but it seems improbable. The Turks are fatalists and take events rather quietly, good and bad. When the Serbians and Bulgarians were being away at the Chatalja lines some years ago, much nearer to Constantinople than the Allies are now, and with only a defeated and decimated army opposing them (I know because I was there), there was no panic at all in Constantinople; in fact, one would not have known from the appearance of the city that the last stand in its defense was being made a few miles away.

The Russian Black Sea fleet during the week made an attack on Turkish forts on the Black Sea, but apparently the damage done was superficial. I have often stated in these columns that reports from Russian sources, official or otherwise, could only be taken with the greatest caution and reserve, and the week last past has furnished the strongest kind of evidence in support of this attitude. An official despatch from Petrograd to London on

The western battle line this week has been devoid of incident, except at two points, though of course the usual resultless fighting has been going on at many points on the long line. The particular incident which merits attention was an important and successful advance of the British near La Bassée which resulted in the capture by them of a couple of miles of German trenches and the occupation of the important village of Neuve Chapelle.

In this operation, the British captured some seven or eight hundred prisoners; but what is more important, the result achieved constitutes a menace to the German hold on La Bassée, which is the key to Lille.

In Champagne, the fighting for the past four weeks, now seen in perspective, appears much more important than till now could be appreciated. A supplemental German bulletin dealing particularly with this series of conflicts states that the fighting in this district has been continuous, night and day, since February 17, when the French general staff initiated this attack in the hope of breaking through at any cost, so as to furnish relief to the Russian forces, then hard pressed in the Masurian lake region of East Prussia.

The Germans further say that this battle is now over, and that it has resulted in the French making only the smallest advances at the cost in casualties of 45,000 men. The German loss is admitted to have been heavy, though much less than the French. The French also, in a special bulletin, admit the principal statements of the Germans except as to losses, which they place much lower, though not giving any figures, and claim that this movement on their part saved Warsaw for the Russians.

The Polish campaign has decisively assumed the phase of a triple attack on the northern end of the Warsaw-Ivangorod line in the past week. The German forces north of Ossowetz are apparently being used to hold the Russian forces in position and prevent their being sent to critical points to the south. The siege of Ossowetz itself is still going on and by the latest cables the Germans have succeeded in penetrating to the inner line of forts. Russian attempts to create a diversion in this terrain by efforts to break through the line between Suwalki and Augustowo have not been successful.

Farther south to the north of the Vistula, two of the movements against Warsaw have now developed to such an extent that their objective can be seen. The Germans in great force have advanced to within a few miles of the fortified town of Pultusk, north of Warsaw, and evidently, after investing that town, intend to proceed eastward for a little distance and then, turning southward, attack Warsaw from the rear. Another column, also, in strong force is advancing on and has nearly reached Novo Georgievsk, the strongest defense of Warsaw, apparently with the plan of laying siege to that fortress in form.

On the western front of Warsaw the throwing of heavy German reinforcements into the line gives color to the above theory.

THE WORTH OF A SOUL

A SERMON BY REV. MILFORD H. LYON *

"Likewise, I say unto you, there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth." Luke 15: 10

THE difference in human lives is very largely a difference in standards of value. If you know what a man deems of greater and what he considers of lesser importance, you have a key to his character and an index to his future. All effort and incentive also are proportionate to realization of value. No man would leave the comforts of home to go to the gold-fields of Alaska merely to obtain worthless sand or stone. He is willing to endure all the rigors and hardships of that Arctic climate because he hopes to obtain possession of a certain yellow metal which will bring to him and his loved ones not only the necessities, but also the luxuries of life. If in these coming days we are to get men and women to sacrifice their time and strength and substance in the work of the salvation of souls, it will be because they have been gripped by the great truth that a human soul is the most precious treasure in all God's universe. And just in proportion as they realize the value of a soul will they put forth earnest effort in the work of human rescue.

Man has subjected the value of a human soul to almost every commodity under the shining sun. First of all, man has subordinated the importance of a soul to conquest and ambition. We think of the awful tragedy being enacted upon European soil today. Millions of men grappling in a death struggle in the greatest war in history. Little thought had the rulers, who plunged a continent into this terrible vortex, for the worth of a human life. The blood of the bravest and best sons of earth is being poured out, not for the benefit of mankind, but merely to gratify revenge, selfish ambition, and lust for power.

Man the Crown of Creation

Moreover, man has sacrificed the value of human souls for the sake of creating and building great organizations. We look upon men merely as material to make a school, a lodge, a church, a state, a political party, as we would think of bricks or stone to build a building. We have yet to learn the great truth that the state was made for man, not man for the state. Some have even thought of revivals as merely means to build up religious organizations. The church, like the individual, might gain the world and yet lose its own soul.

Moreover, man has subjected the value of a human soul merely to the accumulation of property. Our own age has become money mad. We speak of the ancient Israelites worshipping a golden calf; we are doing the same today. There is no enterprise today so dangerous to the physical, the intellectual or moral welfare, but if the pay is big enough there will be always multitudes who will take the risk.

The laws of our country are written more for the protection of property than for the protection of life. Gold is the god of more people than is Jesus. The Golden Rule has too often given way to the rule of gold. Prophecy tells us the time will come when a man will be regarded of more value than much fine gold, but we have not yet reached that period. We are caring more for money than for manhood, more for coin than for character, more for dollars than for duty. Many people are more interested in making a living than they are in making a life.

Furthermore, man has subjected the value of a soul to appetite and physical gratification. I ask, why do you indulge in that filthy habit? Does it make a better man of you? Give you higher ideals or strength of character? No, you say, it is merely because I like to do it. Sometimes when they wish to be especially harsh, they call some men hogs. This is an insult—to the hogs. Lots of men will do things that hogs will not think of doing. You couldn't get a four-footed hog to put his hat on the side of his head and stick a cigarette between his teeth. You couldn't get a thoroughbred swine to swill down the booze that human hogs are doing in your city every day. A man and a dog will go into a booze joint and after a half hour the man will come out reeling and staggering, but the dog will come out sober and walk off like a gentleman. Many a young man will stain and soil and scar his eternal soul merely for the gratification of appetite and a night's indulgence.

In contrast with man's depreciation of the human soul, mark God's appreciation. All during the centuries, your heavenly Father has been endeavoring to impress upon mankind how great a value he set upon a human life. He has shown this by the environment with which he has surrounded his creation. If the environment of man is great, how much greater in his endowment. If an artist would spend a fabulous sum upon a frame for a painting, would you not reasonably expect the picture within the frame would be of greater value? Marvelous, indeed, is the physical endowment of man.

The Price of a Man

God has shown the great worth he set upon a human life by the gift of his own Son. First, by the incarnation of Jesus, when God for all time deigned to occupy a human life. He forever set his stamp and seal upon that life. Also by the work of Christ he revealed his conception of human worth. There was no life he did not deem of great value. He delighted to go before the dawn of the morning to heal the blind, the lame and the leper. He put his strong, everlasting arms down beneath the lowest stratum of society, and thus lifted up the entire structure.

Jesus emphasized the value of a soul. At one time he declared: "Of how much more value is a man than a sheep." Some thoroughbred stock raisers will get as high as one thousand dollars for a sheep. In Madagascar and other heathen countries, before the missionaries went, you could buy a full grown man for three dollars. I do not know where you can buy a man for three dollars now, unless it is in some of these cities when they are voting on the question of licensing booze; then you can buy some fellows for a glass of beer—and then pay more than they are worth. Why has the proportion changed in our civilization and the value of a man constantly risen? It has been due to the workings of Christ's Gospel in human souls. At another time Jesus exclaimed, as he saw the sparrows flitting from branch to branch: "No sparrow falls to the ground without your Father's notice." If God will attend the funeral of a sparrow, will he not care for you and me?

There is a tendency in many quarters to trust to other agencies for the uplifting of man and the gaining of human rights, rather than to the Gospel plan. Labor unions, legislation, can accomplish something, but comparatively little. If the working people of this country ever get their rights it will be through the compelling might of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

The Dynamics of Social Reform

Whenever you get an employer soundly converted you will have a man that will look upon his business as a means of serving God. It is his opportunity to contribute to human welfare. And when you get an employee thoroughly converted, he will look upon his employer, not as one from whom he is to get as much as he can, and to give as little as possible in return, but he will have a spirit to labor for the common good. The motto of both employer and employee will be: "All for each and each for all." More and more I feel the importance of the value of Christianity, not simply for "the sweet by and by," but for the "nasty now and now," not merely to get men to a home in heaven when they die, but also to get them to have a heaven in the home while they live. When the jeweled hand of wealth grasps the calloused hand of toil, and both are clasped by the pierced hand of the Son of God, it will solve the problems of strikes and lockouts, and solve them right, too.

Womanhood never had a champion till Christ came. Woman was merely the toy or slave of man. It is the Gospel that has given woman her proper place in society. A Christless woman is the most ungrateful creature on earth, when everything she has she owes to Jesus. Childhood had no champion till Christ came. Even the philosopher Plato advocated the abandonment of superfluous children. "If you have more in your family than you want," said he, "put them out on the mountain and feed them to the wild beasts." I am glad that I did not live in Plato's time, for I was the youngest of fourteen children. Jesus said: "Suffer the little children to come unto me."

In the pearls of Christ's parables, as recorded in the fifteenth chapter of Luke, Jesus spoke of the lost sheep, the lost silver and the lost son. In the first case, one out of one hundred was lost; in the second, one out of ten; in the third, one out of two; but in each case the thing lost was of value and there was joy in the heart of the owner when it was found. Likewise, said Jesus: "There is joy in the presence of the angels over one sinner that repenteth."

God's Yearning Over Souls

There are many things that the people of this earth are interested in that the angels in heaven would pay no attention to at all. Women will scramble at a bargain counter worse than a football scrimmage. They will talk by the hour about styles in hats and gowns, while the angels would stop to think for a moment whether they were dressed in silk or calico. Men will talk politics by the hour and sit up all night merely to hear the election returns, and the angels would merely smile at their foolishness. Suppose everything you have said in the last six months had been recorded on phonograph tablets, and you were tied in your chair and all these things ground out in your ears. Wouldn't it make you feel foolish? How much of the thought and time and strength of many of the average persons is absorbed with the poor, foolish things that perish with the moment!

In the last place, God has shown how great a value he sets upon a human soul by the sacrifice and death of Jesus Christ. Whatsoever one is willing to die for, that he counts of great worth. I do not deem our salvation from sin a matter of such infinite importance that in the person of Christ he was willing to die for us, certainly it is a matter worth living for. The rescue of a soul from eternal death is the most important business that ever occupied human effort and attention. A friend coming over from Europe said that when out in the ocean the cry went up, "A man overboard!" Immediately the whistles blew, the engines were reversed, the lifeboats were lowered, the lifelines were thrown out, all the business on that great steamship was stopped to rescue the lost man. If we could but comprehend it, we would see that all about us are overboard, struggling in the billows of sin.

A friend on the Pacific Coast has wanted to come to California in the hunting season. He says that when you get a pack of hounds and your elk-killed rifles and go up in the mountains and see a deer coming within rifle range, there goes a tingling through every nerve and fiber of your being such as nothing on this earth equals. "Oh," said I, "my friend, there is something better than that. God has given us the opportunity of hunting a nether game, human souls that are going to spend eternity somewhere."

They That Win Many to Righteousness

Supposing that I should announce that on the night of the coming week, at a most unseasonable hour, say at 2 o'clock in the morning, I would dig publicly from this platform a secret process by which ordinary rocks and stone could be immediately changed into nuggets of pure gold. It would about excitement! The telegraph and telephone would spread the news all over the surrounding states. Every steam and electric road would run special cars and trains from all directions. At 6 o'clock on the evening before, the building would be packed and every street near the tabernacle would be crowded by eager throngs, eager to hear the news. They would climb up on the roof and tear off the boards. As soon as they found the secret, without waiting for the light of day they would start out with lanterns, gathering up stones.

Supposing you should stop a man and ask his opinion about the tariff or the reserve banking system. He would say: "Don't bother me; I am busy." Supposing you should try to talk to him about a baseball team has the best prospects for winning the pennant in the National League. He would say: "Don't talk to me about baseball. I am busy." It is eagerness to obtain the new-found wealth which make everything else seem insignificant. But we have something far greater than this, a divine alchemy by which the poor, hard, stony human hearts can be changed into the pure gold of children of God and a citizen of the eternal kingdom. It is a work worth your while. It is a man's job. It challenges your best strength and thought and effort. Save a man if you can, or a woman or a child. Save some one. There will be joy in your heart; yea, there will be joy among the angels in heaven.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON S. COOPER

The Hallowing of Life

SUNDAY, March 28. Psalm 95: 6. "Let us worship and bow down; let us kneel before the Lord our Maker." An act of worship is intended to hallow the life. It is not a fleeting bit of ritualism, a spasm of homage which passes with the hour. It is purposed to be the expression of a mood in which everything in life is to be sanctified. Acts of worship are to create the atmosphere in which we live and move and have our being. Shall we say that the acts are to create attitudes, so that when we leave the sanctuary the spirit of worship is to accompany us into our common life? I do not take the reverence of the church into the matter. The spirit of adoration is to be with me in the country lane. Yes, a certain awe is to be in the background of my festivity, hallowing my moment, and making my laughter pure and sweet as the morning song of birds.

I do I say that when we go to worship we go to hallow life. The hour is spent in the service of the year. And let us remember that in these acts posture helps the mood of worship. "Let us worship—let us kneel." We add fresh difficulties to the soul when we deny it the helpmeet of the body. When the body lounges the soul finds it hard to worship. A man with his hands in his pockets will find it difficult to pray. Yes, irreverent postures are unfriendly to adoration. And therefore let us make our bodies the servants of our souls. When we worship let our bodies manifest the wished-for mood of the soul. "Let us worship and bow down; let us kneel before the Lord our Maker." J. H. J.

How the Soul Finds Peace in God

MONDAY, March 29. Isaiah 26: 1-10. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is steadfast on thee, because he trusteth in thee." The Hebrew literally rendered is "Peace, peace." In the busy, noisy streets of a manufacturing or commercial town it is often the case that double windows are employed to exclude the noise. So the soul that trusts God absolutely is kept within the double windows of "Peace, peace."

Here is, as the apostle John tells us, a twofold peace which the Master gave on the resurrection evening. "He said, Peace be unto you, and showed them his hands and side." "And he said to them again, Peace be unto you, and when he had said this he breathed on them and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost." The first is the peace of the evening hour, when we return soiled and sorrowful through contact with the world and require forgiveness and cleansing. The second is the peace of the morning, when we go forth to do the work that Jesus did, and tread in his steps. Althen we need his Spirit and grace, so that we may be kept steadfast, unmovable, and always abiding in his work. But what an inestimable boon it is to receive, in either case, the assurance of breathing forth of his peace!

Note, however, the condition. The mind with its busy planning, the heart with its vagrant impulses and the imagination with its wandering contrivances for deliverance and self-help, must be dead and called back to center themselves in God. Our hearts must be stayed, because we wait absolutely and only for his salvation. F. B. M.

Negative Christians

TUESDAY, March 30. Proverbs 14: 4. "Where no oxen are, the crib is clean." There is a French proverb which reads, "He makes no mistakes, and makes nothing else." The writer of the Proverbs has in mind the negative good man—the man who is never making mistakes, but who never makes anything else. He is like a clean stable with no oxen to soil it, a factory with no output; everything is systematic and methodic, the arrangements are perfect, but the man either does not have force enough to utilize them in any positive way, or he is coward, does not dare to begin. He may be a native saint—but his saintliness is of little value to the world. He is like the perfect ship that never leaves the shipyard, nice to look at, but not half as interesting and surely not half as useful and trustworthy to the voyager as the battered vessel that has faced many a storm at sea.

Jesus pictures the elder son in the parable in like as a negative perfectionist. "Lo, these many years do I serve thee; neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment." Yet this same negative good man became angry and would not go in when his brother who was lost was found, and the father, in his generous, forgiving heart, was fain to make merry and to rejoice. The elder son needed heart, he needed humanity, he needed the passion of a positive doer of deeds rather than the self-righteousness of a man who simply rests his case on never having transgressed at any time.

So God looks upon the man with strong, passionate, active doing, even through the mistakes that always attend one who is moving, not judging him always by the outward failures which the world sees, but by the inner motive, by realizing what he has done and resisted.

Carlyle said, "Granted the ship comes into harbor with shrouds and tackle damaged, the pilot is blame-worthy. He has not been wise nor all-powerful; but to know how blameworthy, tell us whether his voyage has been around the globe or only to Ramsgate and the Isle of Dogs!" C. S. C.

Rest and Peace Found in Doing His Will

WEDNESDAY, March 31. John 5: 30-47. "I seek not my own will, but the will of the Father, which hath sent me." What an agony they must suffer whose life seems at the mercy of some cruel fate, or iron destiny, or implacable unalterable law! They beat their breasts against the bars of their cage till they fall panting, dying to the floor. But as soon as the soul has learned to recognize God's will in all the events of life—in the veriest trifle, like the falling of a sparrow or the shedding of a hair, in what God permits as well as what he appoints, in the coming of a Judas with the cup in hand, or of an angel to strengthen—then there is rest.

You are separated from some twin-soul, you are persecuted for righteousness' sake, you are yoked with an uncongenial partner—now look up and believe that your Father is not unkindful and could deliver you if it were absolutely necessary. Look up to the rainbow-encircled throne, and say, "Yes, my Father." Do you not find the spirit of a new acquiescence breathing rest and peace through your soul? This was our Lord's way. He lived in the moment. He was always touching the Father's will in the incidents of daily Providence. The doing of the Father's behest was his yoke, which he consecrated forevermore. Remember a yoke is for two. If you set about doing it also, you will find him at your side, as a true yoke-fellow. However hard and difficult the ground, it will be easy for you and him together. Gulfs are bridged, barriers pierced, space annihilated, when the soul and Christ unite in God's will. F. B. M.

God Gives Us Courage for Life's Battle

THURSDAY, April 1. Genesis 15: 1. "Fear not, Abram: I am thy shield." Abram's life was one of spiritual adventure. He was called by God to make unusual changes in his life plans. These changes involved the leaving of his lands and kindred and going forth to unknown places and engaging in perplexing contests, all of which tended to multiply fears and apprehensions as to his future. When these words were spoken to him by Jehovah Abram had just returned from a fierce battle with the enemies of the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, which enemies had taken captive Lot, Abram's brother's son. It was then that the Lord in a vision said to him, "Fear not, Abram: I am thy shield."

One of the great values of true religion is to deliver us from fear and dark forebodings. To fear and to worry is equivalent to saying that we are not to be dealt with justly and lovingly by God. Abram's life teaches that if a man is willing to follow God's leadership; if he is always ready to confess his mistakes, and keep right on about his work, fear is a baseless and wicked exercise. Every life is a kind of spiritual adventure. The soul goes forth each day to be tried with new and unforeseen changes and tasks, and some of these experiences seem at times both fearful and unbearable. "Something is wrong," we say; "we have sinned unpardonably." At such moments we should remember God's words to Abram, whose tests of confidence in Jehovah were greater than any of ours, but who always found at the right moment the voice of God assuring him: "Fear not, Abram: I am thy shield."

It is not the things we have to endure that count, it is the sense of power we have to go through them that settles things. Our obstacles, regardless of their size, crumble when we bring up against them the irresistible might of God. Think today upon the power and love of Jehovah. The Psalmist said:

I will say of Jehovah, he is my refuge and my fortress;
My God, in whom I trust.

There shall no evil befall thee,
Neither shall any plague come nigh thy tent,
For he will give his angels charge over thee,
To keep thee in all thy ways.

Growing More and More unto His Likeness

FRIDAY, April 2. Philippians 1: 1-13. "That ye may distinguish things that differ." A friend of mine, who on one occasion had Mr. Roosevelt in his congregation, told me that at the close of the service his distinguished hearer came to thank him for his sermon, which had dealt with conscience and its problems. He said amongst other things: "My difficulty is not so much to distinguish between white and black, as between the different shades of gray." That utterance proved that the speaker knew what the apostle prayed for here. Nothing is more important for us all than to learn to distinguish things that differ, and the unceasing accuracy with which we do so indicates our growing approximation to the likeness of our Lord.

A musician's ear is capable of being trained to distinguish the most delicate shades of sound; so that if a piccolo is silent in a great orchestra, or a single violin is out of tune, he will instantly detect it. So as we know more of our Lord, and live in the growing light of his presence, we shall come to discern with a quick instinct that things which we once permitted are no longer permissible, because they are not in perfect keeping with his holy presence. In this way we become, in the apostle's words, sincere and without offense till the day of Christ. Surely the dawn of that day is in the eastern sky; and just as in the growing light of spring the housekeeper will find it necessary to have a spring cleaning, so to know Christ is to put off some newly discerned inconsistency and choose the opposite. F. B. M.

Our Loving Redeemer

SATURDAY, April 3. Luke 24: 6. "He is not here, but is risen." A Mohammedan once said to a missionary, "We have one thing you have not. When we go to our Mecca, we find at least a coffin." "That is just the difference," replied the missionary. "Our Redeemer liveth, while yours is dead." Christianity does not go to monuments or mausoleums as do the worshipers of Menu, Buddha, Confucius or Zoroaster. Ours is the risen Lord, alive forever more.

To worship ancestors, saints or great religious leaders is idolatry. We should worship only him who has power over life, who bound the monster death in chains and led him away captive forever. An infidel once tried to frighten a little child by saying, "Your God was killed on Calvary." But even the little child understood that Jesus' death and resurrection meant the life and immortality of all those who love him; that his followers would rise in newness of soul life in this world and dwell with him in everlasting life in the world to come. A MOTHER'S VISION

SITTING alone in the firelight, with aged head bent low
Over some little garments that were worn in the long ago,
A woman, old and faded, was dreaming of other years;
And the faces of absent loved ones she saw through a mist of tears.

All was silent; no echo of footfalls swift and gay;
The dancing feet of her children had wandered far away.
Busy and happy and thoughtless, they were scattered far and wide;
All grown to be men and women—save the little boy who died.

It was strange that of all the children, he should feel tonight so near.
His little grave had been covered by the snows of many a year;
Yet she fancied she saw him enter; that she saw him standing there,
His blue eyes clear and smiling, the light on his curling hair.

And a voice spoke from the silence, saying: "This for you I kept:
But my meaning you could not fathom when for your child you wept.
The living have left your hearthstone, but with you shall he abide
In the beauty of deathless childhood, your little boy who died."

SOME of us remember when the talk about revivals pointed back to "forty years ago." That was the time of the great tidal wave of nation-wide revival which left flashes and memories of heavenly glory in many a life. As that awakening grew less and less distinct in the past, the talk has been of a great revival to come. We have longed for it, and prayed for it, and talked about it, but as for actually expecting it in the immediate future most hearts grew faint. It was really too good to expect. The people were going so fast and so far into paths of worldliness and sin that the thought of a nation stirred to renewed concern about God and holiness and immortality seemed too good to be true.

But suddenly we are made to realize that the great religious awakening has come. It has stolen upon us unaware. Steadily the tide has been rising. Reports from all quarters bring glorious news of multitudes turning to God. Sherwood Eddy, back from his Gospel triumphs in China, has been having unprecedented success in winning American students to Christ; from South and West come reports of men and women saved: Philadelphia and its suburbs contribute thousands to the new army of the Cross; Paterson and the surrounding towns and villages become a city of prayer, in preparation for Evangelist Sunday as he comes from Philadelphia to begin his campaign in New Jersey's industrial center; from Akron, Ohio, comes a telegram with these words: "Four hundred and nine men responded to the invitation today; two hundred and twenty-five men this afternoon." After other daily reports come the words: "A total of two thousand one hundred ninety-six in five days." Wabash, Ind., is stirred by revival enthusiasm. Evangelists Hart and Magann report over two thousand professed conversions in East St. Louis. Evangelist Lyon reports about five thousand decisions for Christ at Fort Wayne, Ind. The Epyworth Herald, devoting an issue to revival reports and statements of pastors and workers as to ways young people can pared by Rev. G. W. Ridout, a member of that conference, now connected with the faculty of Taylor University, brings this good news:

"The New Jersey Methodist Episcopal Conference, with a membership of nearly three hundred preachers, just ture of this revivalism was at the meetings were carried on in the pastors of the churches. The most remarkable awakenings occurred at the following places: River, 260 conversions; May, Land, about 150; Cape May, Court House, 268; Manahawkin, 150; over 100; Collingswood, over 100; other points showing good advances. Rev. J. W. Lynch, pastor at Cape May Court House, had the greatest revival there in the history of the church. So great was the interest that people came from all over the county, and the church was taxed to its utmost capacity. Many of the leading citizens of the town were converted. The club rooms were closed and the saloons almost put out of business."

Evangelist Robert Johnson just closed a campaign at Brookville, Pa., with a record of 1,920 decisions for Christ—65 per cent. of the population of the town. The "trail-hitter" included a bank president; three prominent attorneys (one of whom is one of the most prominent criminal lawyers in that part of the state); a former candidate for the United States Senate; numerous business men, ex-county officials, among whom were two ex-sheriffs; present county officials. All classes were represented—bartenders; notorious drunkards and gamblers; clerks; Bible class teachers; church officials; laboring men and women; people ranging in life from millionaires to paupers!

Chapman, Biederwolf, Burge and Butts and other prominent evangelists continue their victorious work. The Presbyterian states: "The revival seems to be general, and is dependent upon no one man or set of men upon any particular methods. The sum of it seems to us that God is moving among them by his Spirit in providence and grace, and the people are willing in the day of his power."

THE SPIRIT OF REVIVAL

By REV. G. W. RIDOUT

I AM the Spirit of Revival. By me prophets spoke and kings were moved and the people mourned. By me Elijah brought fire from heaven and Isaiah and Ezekiel had visions of God. By me Jonah cried aloud and Nineveh repented. John the Baptist lifted up his voice in the wilderness and multitudes turned to the Lord. By me Peter preached at Pentecost, Philip at Samaria, and there was great joy. By me Luther preached and truth and life spread forth to dying nations. By me Wesley and Whitefield woke a nation to righteousness and the church was baptized with fire. By me Finney preached the Gospel, clothed with power, and Moody as he spoke and Sankey as he sang turned the land Godward, and by me the millions today are being called to repentance. By me the Word of God becomes a fire that burns, a hammer breaking hard hearts, a sword piercing consciences. I make sinners tremble and penitents weep, the wicked forsake their ways and the unrighteous their thoughts. By me churches are given joy where there was sadness, preachers gladness of heart instead of sorrow. New songs do now the Christians' tongues employ, and converts with the light of a new life make glad the wilderness and the solitary places.

I come to those who seek me; I stay with those who love me. I have power for the weak and strength for them who have no might. I speak, and behold it is done; I break the stony heart and cleanse the guilty. By my power the drunkard becomes sober, the vile clean, the wicked righteous and the sinner a saint.

"Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord."

help in evangelistic campaigns, records Gospel victories and accessions to the church at many points. Evangelist Sunday, not officially welcomed to Princeton University, visits the town, addresses the students and wins six hundred men for Christ's cause.

A report from the New Jersey Methodist Episcopal Conference, pre-closed its session at Atlantic City March 9. The preachers reported the most remarkable revival year in the history of the conference. There were upwards of eight thousand conversions reported, distributed through the four districts as follows: New Brunswick, 1,500; Camden, 2,900; Trenton, 1,200, and Bridgeton, 2,400. A special fea-

LAST summer in a pleasant yard in a suburban town of Blooming Glen, Pa., a twelve-year-old boy spent many happy hours laying out a model city, made of homes, churches, schools, stores and factories, which he had made with a bracket saw. Houses, wagons and people were in the streets and over this truly model municipality the boy maker and mayor ruled. When fall came the buildings, animals and people were taken in the house and carefully put away. This summer they will not be taken out and put in place again. Boys outgrow such things. And this boy very suddenly outgrew his model city. He belongs to a truly model city now—a city whose streets are of gold and whose gates are of pearl. But the little stored-up buildings of his model city seem lonely. Hearts in the house are aching. In his home town and neighboring villages a bright face and a brave voice are missed. People who do not understand clearly about the golden streets and the gates of pearl say that he is dead.

Ezra Gottschalk was in a very special sense a Christian Herald boy. From December, 1913, to February of 1915 he had sold 1,429 copies of the paper. And it was with his week's supply of Christian Heralds in the brown Christian Herald bag of which he was so proud that he started on that fateful Saturday upon the trip from which he never returned. He sold copies at Perkasio, Sellersville and Souderton; then still having copies to dispose of, and missing the trolley to Hatfield, he started to walk along the track. Crossing a trestle as he was nearing Hatfield, an express car came upon him. Thinking to save his life, he lay down on the ties outside the rail, forgetting that on the express cars the third rail arm reaches out and lies low. The little fellow was torn to pieces, and his sunny life on earth, which had

EZRA'S MITE-BOX

BY ARTHUR H. HOWLAND

alone rather than miss the service. He had just finished reading his Bible through a day or two before he went to that other city. He had planned to finish it in a year, but was one month and thirteen days ahead of schedule time. He began at once at the beginning of the New Testament and had read to the 4th chapter of Matthew—

His father writes: "He was constantly filling notebooks with copied poems and also some of his own production; and all kinds of historical events, dates and statistics of all kinds. He had cupboards full of newspaper clippings and odds and ends of all kinds of literary treasures, pictures and illustrations of all kinds. Every imaginable thing a boy might value was piled up among his belongings. How sacred they all seem now!"

But I have not yet told you about Ezra's mite-box. Not content with his regular offerings, he wanted to raise a special fund for some good work. From a prayer circle he received a mite-box a few days before his death. On Saturday, February 6, there were twenty-one cents in it. Can't we do something about that?

We told his mother and father we thought the Christian Herald readers would like to fill up that mite-box. They replied by returning to us a check for $5.69, due Ezra on his commissions, 69 cents that were in his pocket and the sacred 21 cents. Besides this they add $6.13, representing the cash value of forty-nine coupons Ezra had earned at his Christian Herald work. The Christian Herald adds $20 to the fund and some members of the staff and office force are to make additional contributions later.

Ezra had not definitely stated to what work his mite-box fund is to be applied. But his parents, in answer to our questions, have said that the work which is particularly on their hearts is that for the Eurasians in India; that is, the mixed population, half European and half Asiatic who, as a class, are socially ostracized and spiritually neglected. Mr. and Mrs. Gottschalk were themselves formerly missionaries to India, engaged in work for these Eurasians. They had hoped to return to the work or, if they could not go, that Ezra, after his volunteering for the foreign field, would pose that work. He had said that India would be his chosen field. So that he was to have carried on their unfinished work. But now—

They are here, and Ezra has one, leaving twenty-one cents in his mite-box.

His father and mother suggest that whatever money comes to fill the mite-box be spent for Eurasian orphan and widows.

Ezra's pastor, Rev. C. N. Weir, of the Evangelical Association Church at Perkasio, took for the funeral the words: "He being dead, yet speaking." At two meetings in Philadelphia fifteen boys and girls gave themselves to Christ upon hearing the story of his life and death. They are not the last who will seek Jesus because of him. On all sides there is grief at missing the genial little friend of the people of five towns. But Ezra's life is just beginning. He will be loved in more towns than five. Meanwhile, the mite-box—

It stands now: From Ezra Gottschalk, $12.72 (mite-box 21 cents; pocket, 69 cents; commissions, $6.99; coupons, $6.13). Christian Herald 20.

MEXICO CAUSES WORRY

THE GEORGIA'S 12-INCH GUNS

THE flea must be the national emblem of Mexico. The Mexican official has all the temperamental qualities and muscular ability that go into the composition of that more or less interesting member of the animal kingdom, and there are times when his habits can be typified by a better emblem.

General Huerta gave the world an excellent exhibition of this trait. And in the latter days of the tempest in Mexico, our secretary of state seems to be having his own troubles getting near enough to Mexican leaders to gain their attention to his wishes. In the first days of March this difficulty began to worry the countries that have vital interests in Mexico.

The movements and plans of the various armed forces serving one or another of the contending leaders in Mexico have not been made clear in the news despatches for a long time. We are left to imagine such details of a general revolution. Most of the news has had to do with the situation in Mexico City, where General Obregon, representing General Carranza, has been in temporary control. As stated in last week's issue of the Christian Herald, a shortage of foodstuffs and the fear that the city would be given over to the lawless element by the withdrawal of Obregon and his troops elicited a stern note from Secretary Bryan to General Carranza at Vera Cruz with seemingly satisfactory result. The Carranza Government denied that there was danger to foreigners in Mexico City, and asserted that the later supply, which had been imperiled by Zapata's bandits hovering nearby, was being protected. General Obregon was planning a northern movement against Villa, but would leave a garrison at the national capital.

There was something unsatisfactory about the replies and the general situation, and on March 8 it was announced that President Wilson and Secretary of the Navy Daniels would increase the number of battleships now at Vera Cruz as a preliminary step to ordering the Atlantic fleet to Mexican waters if developments required. Our fleet is now at Guantanamo for spring maneuvers, and it was said that orders had been sent to Rear Admiral Fletcher, who is in command of the fleet, to despatch five vessels to Vera Cruz to join the battleship Delaware, the cruisers Des Moines and Tacoma, and the gunboats Sacramento and Petrel.

In anticipation of Obregon's evacuation the same number of French and half that number of English, 12,000 Spaniards, and a good many Chinese, Japanese, Turks and other nationalities. Up to March 8 no reply had been sent by Carranza to Secretary Bryan's note, demanding adequate protection for foreigners and their property and release of railroad facilities for the transportation of foodstuffs.

The news of March 9 related the evacuation of Mexico City by General Obregon and his troops, and stated that followers of Zapata had promptly entered the capital. This news, by way of agents of Villa, was confirmed by despatches from John R. Silliman, now a special representative of the State Department at Vera Cruz. Communi-tion of Mexico City, General Carranza invited the foreign diplomats to make their headquarters at Vera Cruz. The entire corps, however, declined to leave Mexico City, in the belief that the foreign population was in great danger from mobs. The situation was even likened to that of Peking in the days of the Boxer Revolution.

It is estimated that some 26,000 foreigners are in Mexico City, including 2,500 Americans, about 2,500 Germans, and with Mexico City has been cut off since the 6th inst., and the gravity of the situation is rapidly increasing. Talk of armed intervention by the United States was resumed in many quarters, but official Washington discouraged such expectations. The battleships Georgia and Washington are said to be on their way to Vera Cruz, and the Des Moines has been ordered to Yucatan.

It also developed in the news that

Secretary Bryan had some days previously sent a warning to Americans, through the Brazilian minister, to leave Mexico. This warning, however, did not provide Americans in Mexico City with railroad transportation, the Carranza government having taken over the lines for military uses entirely, and even private messages and press despatches from Mexico City were being censored at Vera Cruz, according to the reports.

Carranza's activities have extended to Yucatan, where the port of Progreso had been blockaded, with the result that certain exportations, among them that of sisal, an essential in the twine industry of the United States, has been made impossible, and as one effect of this, it is said, there may be a shortage of binder twine in this country next summer sufficient seriously to affect harvesting of the wheat crop.

The situation as the Christian Herald goes to press tends to justify the opening paragraph of this article. It is not apparent that Secretary Bryan has yet gotten a firm hold upon any responsible Mexican official. Reports were current in the press that somewhat indefinite assurances have been received by a roundabout way that conditions had improved in Mexico City, though a dangerous shortage of food continued. It was stated that some Swedish subjects had been killed, and it was known that a British merchant steamer had been seized by Mexicans, and the protection of our government was requested.

Carranza's reply to Secretary Bryan's first note was evasive, and on March 11 a second note of protest was sent to the Constitutionalist leader. A state of unrest and uneasiness prevails, aggravated by the success with which the Mexican leaders evade definite and direct representations to foreign nations as to what may be expected from those in nominal authority.

Late advices on March 12 declare that the Brazilian minister in Mexico City has notified the State Department at Washington of the killing of an American, John B. McManus, by Zapatistas, the man's body being riddled with bullets. Satisfaction has been demanded from Zapata, who is in no sense a governmental official but is apparently in control at present of the Mexican capital. This news despatch has not yet been fully confirmed nor are all the particulars known.

THE POWER OF THE PRESIDENT

BY CHARLES M. PEPPER

THE power of the President of the United States is vast. Ordinarily it is only discussed in connection with domestic matters. When a situation like the one caused by the world war arises foreign affairs come into view.

Foreign affairs and domestic matters, however, should be considered together in analyzing the President's authority. They are interwoven.

European writers who have studied the American Constitution often refer to the power of the President as greater than that of any European monarch. This is not correct. In two of the greatest of the European monarchies there is no co-ordinate legislative branch of the government similar to the Congress of the United States. Germany has the Reichstag and the Bundesrath, or federal council, but these bodies are far from corresponding to the House of Representatives and the Senate in the United States. They do not afford the same check on the Kaiser's power as Congress does on that of the President.

Russia, until recently, was an absolute monarchy with no parliamentary institutions. The Czar was the autocrat. The establishment of the Duma was a recognition of the growing spirit for liberal political institutions, but the Duma at best bears faint resemblance to the American Congress, though in time it may become a really representative legislative body.

The British monarchy presents a different basis of comparison. English writers, in describing how little real power the King has, often write of the much greater authority possessed by the President of the United States. This is a very misleading illustration. The comparison should be made with the prime minister rather than with the King. The real ruler of Great Britain is the prime minister. Associated with him is the cabinet. And it is here that the difference between the British and the American political systems becomes clear. The cabinet is the real executive authority in Great Britain. The prime minister acts as its mouthpiece. He frequently has to convince his colleagues that certain policies are right and proper before he will take the chance of submitting them to the Parliament, and especially the House of Commons, for approval, and often the other members of the cabinet convince the prime minister that their views, which may differ from his, are the ones which should be adopted. The tendency of British public opinion is to hold the cabinet as a whole responsible.

The cabinet in the United States does not occupy the same position. Sometimes the members are referred to as the President's constitutional advisers. Sometimes they are also spoken of as mere executive clerks. The constitution, it must be remembered, did not create the cabinet as a distinct body. It says that the executive power shall be vested in a President. Then it authorizes Congress to do certain things, and Congress, in pursuance of this authority, from time to time has created executive departments, until now there are nine of these, each presided over by a cabinet minister.

Public opinion in the United States, differing from that in England, has tended more and more to hold the President to complete responsibility for the acts of his administration, and to ignore the cabinet.

A cabinet member can be impeached by Congress. If he disagrees with the President on questions of national or international policy to the degree that his convictions or his conscience will not allow him to support that policy he can resign.

It is not surprising that differences of opinion sometimes arise among members of the cabinet, but in the end it is the opinion of the President that prevails. President Lincoln sometimes overruled Secretary Seward in regard to foreign matters. Sometimes he allowed himself to be overruled by Secretary Stanton in regard to military matters. But in both cases the American people held him responsible for the measures to preserve the Union.

President Grant, when what was known as the Inflation Bill, which provided for paper currency, was before him, had a cabinet whose opinions were divided. The majority were in favor of his signing the bill. That was his own inclination. But when he set out to write a message giving his reasons for approving it, the objections which arose in his own mind impressed him so strongly that instead of approving he wrote a veto message. He did not consult his cabinet about his change of mind. Instead, he read to them the veto message which he immediately thereafter sent to Congress.

President Cleveland, during his second term, had before him what was known as the Silver Seigniorage bill. The amount of silver bullion put into the silver dollar then coined was equivalent to fifty cents. The government, therefore, made about fifty cents of silver bullion on every silver dollar it coined. The bill passed by Congress provided that this excess should also be coined.

President Cleveland's cabinet members were divided. Some of them, for whose opinions he had great respect, thought that he should sign the measure. After full consideration, however, he vetoed it.

During the events growing out of the Cuban insurrection, which led to the war with Spain, there was a sharp division of opinion in President McKinley's cabinet, but the policy which

Japan's Demands on China

WITH the formulation of the long list of Japan's demands on China and the announcement that a Japanese ultimatum has been delivered in Peking, setting a brief limit for compliance, conditions in the Far East have reached a point which threatens serious developments. These demands, twenty-one in number, have been discussed at a number of conferences in the Chinese capital, at which M. Hioiki, the Japanese minister, represented his government. No complete list of the demands has been telegraphed, but it is learned that they included the cession to Japan of the "rights" she had won from Germany in the Shantung campaign, including Kiauchau; the appointment of Japanese in advisory capacities in the administrative, financial and military branches of China's government; concessions or leases to Japan of certain important stations along the coast, all other foreign powers to be excluded from such privileges; the grant of land in China for arsenals on sites to be chosen by Japan, and many other important privileges. When a certain stage of the negotiations had been reached, China, having granted eleven of the demands, refused to yield further and a deadlock resulted, which was followed by the Japanese ultimatum. It now appears that calmer counsels prevailed, for the moment at least, and that the conferences were resumed, China agreeing at the session of March 10 to extend to ninety-nine years the lease of the Antung-Mukden railway, which expires in 1923.

If it be the fact, as has been surmised, that the demands still unsettled include several that strike at the very heart of China's independence, it would seem to be a fitting time for our government, as the friend of both powers and especially as the source of China's republican aspirations, to enter a strong remonstrance. It is not too much to say that China, in such an emergency, will naturally turn to us for counsel and encouragement, and that Japan, too, will be disposed to give heed to a power which has always stood for friendship with and fair play in the Orient. It cannot be regarded as necessary for the future of either China or Japan that there should be any deliberate scheme of spoliation by one against the other. China wants to retain and to govern all her own territory, to maintain the "open door" according to her pledge, to choose her own administrative officials and to live at peace with her neighbor and the whole world. Any movement to secure a strangle-hold on her now, and to enforce the cession of her territory and the surrender of her right to rule her own coasts, would precipitate both war and revolution. It would mean the undoing of all that has been accomplished, in the face of great obstacles, in the last decade. The new life of China has just begun. To subject its four hundred millions of citizens to the disappointment of all their national hopes and aspirations would be to set China back a quarter of a century in social and political development, in religious freedom and in her intercourse with the outside world. Such a thing should not be possible.

The Setback to Civilization

THE war is throwing back civilization. It is undoing the past. It is spoiling the present. It is jeopardizing the future.

Eighteen American social workers, including Jane Addams, Hamilton Holt, Edward T. Devine, Stephen S. Wise, Emily G. Balch, Frederick C. Howe and John Haynes Holmes, have issued a statement calling attention to some of the horrible setbacks to human progress caused by the war, and urging Americans to be ready to express themselves in some affirmative way as freemen, democrats and peace-lovers. They protest that War has brought low our conception of the preciousness of human life as slavery brought low our conception of human liberty. It has benumbed our growing sense of the nurture of life; and at a time when we were challenging Reichstag, Parliament and Congress with the needlessness of infant mortality and child labor it intrinches two million youths with cold and fever and impending death. It has thwarted the chance of our times toward the fulfilment of life, and scattered like burst shrapnel the hands of the sculptors and the violinists, the limbs of the hurdlers and the swimmers, the sensitive muscles of the mechanics and the weavers, the throats of the singers and the interpreters, the eyes of the astronomers and the meters—every skilled and prescient part of the human body, every type of craft and competence of the human mind. It has razed the flowing lines in which the art and aspiration of earlier generations had expressed themselves, and has thus waged war upon the dead. It has whetted a lust among neutral nations to profit by furnishing the means to prolong the struggle. It has sucked into its blood and mire our most recent conquests over the elements—over electricity and air and the depths of ocean; and has prostituted our prowess in engineering and chemistry and technology to the service of terror and injury. It has in its compulsory service made patriotism a shell, empty of liberty. It has threatened the results of a hundred martyrdoms and revolutions, and put in jeopardy those forms of government which make possible still newer social conquests. It has made were-wolves of neighboring peoples, in the imaginations of each other. It has set faithful against faithful, priest against priest, prayers against prayers, for that success of one army which means slaughter of both. It has put its stamp upon growing boys and girls and taught them to hate each other, and taught them to hate other children who have chanced to be born on the other side of some man-made boundary. It has found a world of friends and neighbors, and substituted a world of outlanders and aliens and enemies. It has given the lie to the teachings of missionaries and preachers and educators and will stay civilization in the uttermost parts of the earth.

There is grave danger of our becoming hardened to the war's horrors. Life is as precious, pain is as terrible, the grief of women and children as pitiful as when the war began. We must keep on protesting. We must keep on hating war. We must blind ourselves to the alluring glories of war and turn our hearts back to the brighter, sweeter glories of peace. We must determine to delve down to the roots of our international social fabric to find the real causes of war. We must determine that when they are found they shall be ruthlessly destroyed, no matter what cherished ideals and convictions perish with them. Wars must cease! Wars shall cease! Love is mightier than hate; peace is mightier than strife; Christ is mightier than Mars. The richness of the past must not be lost. The horrors of the present must be curtailed. The future—with life and peace and plenty, with music and wisdom and gladness and fellowship and hope—must be guaranteed. We know that God is on the side of peace.

The Price of Bread

THERE could hardly be a sharper commentary upon the laxity of modern legislation than the failure to apply a check at the outset to those who were responsible for forcing up the price of bread. All the official and legislative machinery failed to accomplish what one man, satisfied with honest profits, has done. When the bakers, with sudden unanimity, announced that the rise in wheat made the five-cent loaf a business impossibility, and raised it to six cents accordingly, the people were obliged to submit. The "poor man's loaf" became the plaything of greedy speculators. But this one man knew better and put his convictions into practical form. He simply rented a bakery, put in expert workmen, bought flour at the market rates and produced good, wholesome bread at a cost which, retailing at five cents per loaf, left a clear profit, after deducting all expenses, of twenty per cent., which was fairly halved between manufacturer and retailer. In the light of this practical experiment on an extensive scale, all theories of the necessity for forcing up bread fall to the ground. The staple of life has probably reached the highest point it will attain in a generation, and it has been demonstrated that even under such conditions, the five-cent loaf is a perfectly safe and good proposition. There is surely something radically wrong when a country which can afford to give away millions of bushels of its surplus wheat to fight famine abroad is obliged to pay a premium on every loaf it consumes at home.

A Dream Fulfilled

"LANGLEY'S FOLLY" has at last been proven to be a product not of folly, but of wisdom. It can really fly. It has flown, and its present custodians declare it will fly higher and farther. It is no longer the relic of a hopeless dream. It is the demonstration of a dream fulfilled. The nation laughed when Professor Langley's flying machine fell from the cliff from which it was launched, straight to the ground, without demonstrating any birdlike capabilities. But he had made models which to many scientific minds demonstrated that flight with heavier-than-air machines was practicable. Professor Langley died in 1906—just before the great public triumph of the Wright brothers.

It is, after all, not much of a disgrace to fail. The real disgrace is not to venture forth upon the truth revealed, in the desperate search for truth still hidden. The real disgrace is to be disobedient to the heavenly vision. The real hero is the man from whose soul the jeers of his contemporaries, like futile arrows from a brave knight's while he remains confident that the men of the future will believe what he believes.

Many a life is full of these wistful dreams unfulfilled. But, after all, we should not care whether recognition comes to us or to a so long as it is truth that is honored. We not greatly care whether the recognition work's worth come before or after it is faithful every day—that is the test. Faithful to the highest and best, following "the Glean" is the thing noble and worth while. Others led to the faith and kept true because we have steady. Others will go farther because we have gone as far as we could. And who knows, when the final rewards are given, whether the greatest go to those who wrought the final victories or those who first dreamed the dream and, though vainly, to grasp its promise?

The Churches and the War

FROM a reader in Kansas City, Mo., we have received the following letter, which expresses a thought that is doubtless shared by any thousands of Americans, in and out of the churches:

I have been firmly convinced that the Christian churches are and ever have been extremely inconsistent. I have read your articles with great pleasure. When such editorials as you come from the orthodox pen, there is yet hope that so-called Christians may be led to see and understand even as the heathen meant that they should.

That our glorious country has sold its birthright for a mess of pottage to the manufacturers of war munitions is a fact to make the American cheek burn with shame; if we are lameless in this degradation it is the beginning of degeneracy, and when the ideals on which our republic is based have crumbled, we are a fallen people.

As a newspaper woman I am not ignorant of orthodox writings. I have never admired them to any extent; I wish to intrude upon their peace and satisfaction; but I would like to say that if they should all take the brave, forward-looking stand of the Christian Herald, even if they did not convert one to their own particular faith, they would at least gain the unqualified respect and entire confidence of the whole world.

Is the writer justified in charging the churches with inconsistency on this question, as the letter states? Is there anywhere in the United States a single church or congregation that has gone on record as approving the nation's traffic in munitions of war? Is the silence of the churches concerning that traffic to be interpreted as the silence of approval?

Our churches of all denominations have stood in earnest prayers for peace. They have given generous help to the war sufferers. They are ever looking forward, in hopeful expectation, to the time when an end will come to the sanguinary struggle which has drenched half the world with blood and filled millions of nameless graves. Further, our churches have preached the Gospel of peace on earth and they have led their people to look for beyond the present to the glorious vision of a world at peace. Is it conceivable then that, praying, believing and teaching as they do, the churches could silently approve of the abominable un-Christian traffic in war material which is now going on? We cannot believe it. We expect soon to hear a loud call of dissent from those churches that are true to the great Christian ideals, which will tell us just where they stand.

Commodore Perry's Motto

—MR. D. CARPENTER, a reader in Gashland, Mo., writes: "I have just read your piece on 'Quitters' and thought it enclosed might help some of them. The author is unknown. He sends us a little article headed with Commodore Perry's motto, 'Never give up the ship.' It says: 'Are you engaged in a laudable pursuit? Go on. If you give up in despair, you are half ruined. Are you a merchant? Are sales few? Do but little money come in? Go on, business will revive and you will succeed. Are you a mechanic? Have you but half enough work to keep you employed? Go on. Finish what you have engaged; you will have more to do another day. Are you poor? Do not work, go on! If you are faithful, you will rise above want. Never lag by the way; never rot out; never die so long you can catch a straw or hold your head above water. It's only a way to succeed.' Lincoln was an illustration of persistent and successful perseverance. No one man in ten thousand has so many difficulties to surmount as he. What would have happened if he had been a quitter? But we might go farther back to Columbus, whose famous 'Sail on! Sail on!' was his unending reply to those who urged him to abandon the great quest which ended in ultimate success. Our Missouri friend sends a clipping from some unknown source which is a good motto to go by as advice:

"Sing away, ye joyous birds, while the sun is o'er us, If I only knew the words, I would join the chorus."

Blind Girl Suddenly Sees

MIS MAUDE E. LINCOLN

THE other day Miss Maude Emerson Lincoln of Marblehead, Mass., who was born blind twenty-one years ago, received her sight suddenly. At nine years of age she was sent to a blind asylum, where she was educated. The restoration of her sight was not claimed as the result of prayer or faith, but from natural causes. The medical staff at the asylum told her never to have anything done to her eyes, as sight would naturally come to them some day. A specialist thinks that hers was a case of keratitis of the cornea, a form of inflammation. This, in passing, leaves scars that obscure the sight. The scars gradually grow thinner and thinner, until they disappear. Whatever may have been the trouble with her eyes, the disease was self-terminating, and now this young woman rejoices in her vision, and the new, glorious world that is revealed. Physical blindness is the type of spiritual blindness, which shuts the soul in with the darkness of sin, and which is relieved, not by natural causes, but by the touch of the divine fingers of Christ. The young woman who received her sight can adopt the words of the man born blind: "One thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see." (John 9: 25)

Motherhood Instinct

THE maternal instinct, so marked among the lower animals, had this striking illustration the other day: A farmer bought a little pig of his neighbor, and putting it in a sack, which he threw over his shoulder, started home. The mother broke through the fence, jumped up at the man's back, ripped the sack open with her teeth, released her offspring and ran after the intruder, who undertook to hit a hasty retreat, and bit his limbs quite seriously. The paper which gave this incident also told of a father and mother who sold two of their beautiful children for $1.00, giving as a reason that they needed the money to pay off mortgage on the farm. Another paper, a few days before, recorded the confession of a mother who smothered her baby to death, giving as the reason that it cried so much it got on her nerves." These cases of parental coldness and infidelity are the rarest exceptions. Most mothers are the sweetest, tenderest, most devoted, and most like God of any creatures on earth. God himself thus uses a mother's love as the symbol of his own: "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." (Isa. 66: 13.)

Rare Plants at Flower Show

A SCIENTIST who has spent twenty-seven years hunting and studying the plants and flowers of South America, especially in Bolivia, Peru and Brazil, brought a rare collection from those countries to the flower show of the Horticultural Society, held in the Grand Central Palace, New York, during the week beginning March 17. The exhibit includes $75,000 worth of orchids. There were some poisonous plants among them. One of these plants was a species of jatropha from Colombia, which secretes a poison like that of the copperhead snake, and shoots it through two fangs when touched, making a deadly wound. Most of the collection was exquisitely beautiful, delicious in fragrance and healthful in essence. Some of the plants and flowers acted almost as though they had intelligence. Their exhibitor insisted that they did, that they saw, shrank with modesty at the approach and touch of rude hands, and did many other things that people do. He may have drawn on his imagination. God made the flowers to answer to our desire for the beautiful and as a material token of his love for us. And the Messenger who brought us the Father's saving love at the cost of his own life is thus fittingly typified by the wise man: "I am the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys." (Sol. Song 2: 1.)

Panama Canal Builders Promoted

COLONEL GEORGE W. GOETHALS was nominated on March 4 to be a major general of the line, in recognition of his services in building the Panama Canal. Four other nominations for promotion of officers were presented at the same time, and all were immediately confirmed in an open session of the Senate, an unusual proceeding. The other nominations were Brigadier General William C. Gorgas, surgeon general, to be major general, medical department; Colonel Harry F. Hodges and went down on the ill-fated steamer Titanic. The result of this war from a religious standpoint," said Mr. Stead, "promises to be a real national regeneration. The British army, particularly the new one being organized by Lord Kitchener, is now filled with the Puritan spirit as no army has been since Cornwallis's time. A common expression nowadays is that 'the army has become religious.' I heard of several different companies that would not go into battle until they had offered prayer, even insisting that their colonel lead them in prayer." Precisely this state of affairs exists in Germany. France and Russia, too, are swept by the same wave of religious enthusiasm, and other nations involved in the conflict are flying to the cross for refuge and help. If this religious revival shall intensify and remain, this indescribably horrible war will not have been entirely in vain, and the words of the psalmist will be fulfilled: "Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee." (Ps. 76: 10.)

Fatal Operation for Freckles

TELEGRAPHIC despatches in several New York journals state that a wealthy woman recently went to a specialist for the removal of freckles. The anesthetic was too much for her, and stopped her heart. She was a woman of fine character and neither her folly nor pride deserved such a tragedy.

Art makes a poor success of it in trying to improve the complexion or features, and is generally injurious. Nature has to give the real touch of beauty. Beauty that is of any value is more than skin deep. The tyranny of many social customs calls to mind these words: "Pride compasseth them about as a chain." (Ps. 73: 6.)

A Boy Hero's Rise

THIS story in the press teaches an excellent lesson: In a Western state a farmer's boy was accustomed to go down to the railroad bridge fishing. He was bright and kind, and made friends with the railroad men, especially an engineer. One day the boy while fishing saw Jim's train stop in the middle of the bridge, and, feeling sure that something was wrong, climbed up and crawled on the cross-ties to the cab. As he did so he heard shooting and knew something dreadful was happening. He saw there was no one in the cab. He got under the cars and uncoupled the engine tender and mail car from the rest of the train. Then he got into the cab and pulled the lever he had seen Jim pull and drove the engine at high speed to the nearest station. There a posse of men went back to the bridge and frightened off the robbers who had held up the train. When Jim saw the boy he threw his arms about him and hugged him. About $30,000 in baggage was saved. An agent of the company went to the boy's house to thank him and to ask him to go to the city, as the president of the road had sent for him. The president said, "Now, what do you want me to do for you as a reward?" "I do not want anything for myself, but I would like for you to promote Jim," was the boy's reply. The president smilingly said, "I guess we can take care of you and Jim, too." As soon as the boy was big enough he was taken into the employ of the road and was advanced by one step after another and is now the president of the railroad. The boy's courage, sagacity, unselfishness, simple unconsciousness of his worth, and excellent moral character were splendid qualities for the making of a successful railroad president. This type of manliness is thus referred to in an appeal to young men who had started in the Christian life in an un-Christian age: "I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one." (1 John 2: 14.)

PARIS HONORS SON OF THE FAMOUS GARIBALDI

A SPONTANEOUS demonstration greeted General Ricciotti Garibaldi, the Italian patriot and patriarch, when he visited Paris the other day. The general, his wife and his son, Colonel Peppino Garibaldi, lunched at Paillard's restaurant, which had hung out an Italian flag in honor of the distinguished guests. The news spread rapidly, and when the aged veteran, leaning on his crutch, left the restaurant so great was the throng that traffic on the boulevard was brought to a standstill. The general, visibly moved by this expression of sympathy, smiled, bowed and lifted his patriarchal felt hat in response to the cries of "Vive Garibaldi! Vive l'Italie!" Later in the day, the general and M. Rivet visited the president of the republic. General Garibaldi told the president he had made the journey to Paris to better acquaint himself with the international situation. The Garibaldis have at different times been hunted as conspirators, lauded as patriots, sent into exile and again exalted to the summit of popular favor. The name stands for everything that is upright and honorable, brave and true and liberty-loving. Italy does well to prize the family, and Paris to honor its patriarch. We are reminded that above the names of all the leaders and patriots of the world is that of the Captain of our salvation, of whom it is said: "God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name." (PHIL. 2: 9.)

Lieutenant Colonel William L. Sibert, United States Corps of Engineers, to be brigadier general; Commander H. H. Rousseau, United States navy, promoted to the rank of rear admiral. These giant leaders and the multitudes of men under them in cutting the path through the isthmus, making the two oceans one, have made it possible for ships and wares to pass the more easily between the West and the East, to bring the thoughts and hearts of the world into closer communication and the souls of men into a more vital relationship to Christ, who is to dominate the laws, literature, commerce and religion of the world. These promotions are the voice of a great nation taking up these words: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." (Matt. 25: 21.)

War Producing Religious Revivals

THAT Great Britain has turned from religious indifference and is being swept by a tide of stern Puritanism as a result of the war is asserted by F. Herbert Stead, head of Browning Hall, London, a brother of W. T. Stead, the noted journalist, who

AMERICAN CHILDREN SEND EASTER SHIP TO WAR ORPHANS. Through activities of the organization known as the Belgian Relief Fund, a steamer named the Argosy, loaded with provisions for women and children in Belgium, is to leave New York as an "Easter ship of life" with her cargo consigned to the seven-year-old son of King Albert of Belgium, Prince Jean. This expression of practical sympathy made possible chiefly by the children of America whom the appeal for this beautiful relief had been directed.

THE PLAGUE PERSISTS. The epidemic of mouth disease, which was supposed to have been stamped out, is breaking out here throughout the country, and local authorities are established as fast as the dread pest itself. Pennsylvania has obliged the railroad to cease transporting cattle from infected parts across that state; and the county of Lehigh, N. Y., was placed under quarantine and many valuable cows were shot and buried twelve feet deep in quicklime.

ASTRONOMERS GETTING EXCITED OVER THE PLANET MARS. Scientists at Lowell Observatory, Flagstaff, Ariz., announce that the east side of the planet's red ring has distinctly widened, and being understood by the astronomers, a message has come from Mars asking an explanation of the disturbed condition of the atmosphere of the east side of the planet Earth.

OTOMAN RUSSIAN STATESMAN DIES. Count Witte died March 12. Count Witte was of noble birth, but after a remarkable career ended by the Czar in recognition of his services at the Portsmouth Conference, which settled the Russo-Japanese peace. This statesman was born in 1849, and began his career as a railway employee at $50 a month. Eventually, after the Trans-Siberian Railway, became minister of finance, and was a powerful factor in the development of Russian industries and commerce.

STAMPLESS MAIL. A news despatch from London states that letters and packages of a value of $1,600,000 have been mailed free through the Postoffice Department acting as an intermediary between belligerent powers, using a deficit to that extent. All nations are represented in this governmental service, scattered from Japan to South Africa.

PROTESTS NEED, EVEN IF THEY DON'T HAVE CONSCIENCES. The possession of such monitor in good working order might have saved the Central Railroad of New Jersey from its present predicament of facing a $100,000 penalty for rebating (to the Lehigh Valley Navigation Company) on shipments, a fine United States court at Trenton, N. J., imposed and the railroad guilty on 185 separate counts. The minimum penalty is said to be $500 but the maximum may be imposed.

WORLD WISH THE FOOD SHIPMENT STOPPED ON THE POSTOFFICE. The president of the recently formed German-American Relief Alliance, Dr. C. J. Hexamer, proposes that parcel post be utilized for the sending of foodstuffs to civilians in the warring countries. United States mails, in his opinion, should not be tampered with by any of the belligerent nations.

AMERICA NOW LEADS IN BABY-SLAYING. One-fifth of each year's crop of babies in the United States, estimated to be 500,000, die during their first year of entirely preventable causes, according to Dr. M. M. Carrick of the American Medical Association, speaking recently in New York; and 1,500,000 persons are ill and do not die. The association is sending out speakers to inform the public on the subject of preventable sickness, believing that 42 per cent. of the present death rate is unnecessary. Infant milk for infants is cited as one prolific cause of infantile death. The doctors are desirable citizens, but no one will regret if they show us how to get along without them and the doctor.

CLEARING THE DECKS FOR ACTION. Largely because a low rank of rear-admiral held by commanders of fleets in the United States Navy prevents them from taking charge of emergency situations in foreign waters when an admiral or vice-admiral of another navy, even with an inferior fleet, is present, the Navy recently created the grade of admiral, and on March 10, Rear-Admiral Wilson appointed as admirals Rear-Admirals Fletcher, and Cowles, in command respectively of the Atlantic and Asiatic fleets. Previous admirals especially appointed were Arragut and Porter, and Admiral Dewey, who is now admiral of the Navy, the only such officer in the world.

WHEN DEATH IS KIND. On the morning of March 10 Charles A. Schieren, who was mayor of the old city of Brooklyn in 1894-5, died at his home of pneumonia, and twenty-five hours later his wife followed him into the other world, she also having been stricken by pneumonia. Both were seventy-three years of age and were members of the Lutheran Church of the Redeemer. Neither was aware of the approaching death of the other. Mr. Schieren was born in Germany near Düsseldorf and came to this country in 1856. He eventually became head of one of the most important leather manufacturing concerns in the country, and besides his strong interest in religious and charitable affairs was active in politics. He was a director in various business institutions, and also in the Y. M. C. A. and the S. P. C. C. Readers of the Christian Herald will remember that in 1898, when it became imperative that the American people send relief to the Cubans who were starving in the concentration camps, President McKinley appointed a national relief commission of three men, Charles A. Schieren, Stephen Barton and Louis Klopsch, whose headquarters were in the Bible House, and through whose splendid management a great deal of good was accomplished.

THE ADMINISTRATION IS MINUS ONE APPENDIX. Secretary of the Treasury William G. McAdoo, the President's son-in-law, was successfully operated on for appendicitis March 12 by Dr. A. M. Fautleroy.

BUY-A-RAILROAD DAY FOR STATES. California has initiated a new movement to stimulate commerce by setting about buying the Western Pacific Railroad, now in the hands of receivers. Governor Johnson announces that the ownership of this road by the state will assure California permanent commercial freedom. It will also afford the country an interesting example of government-owned industries.

THEY PROBABLY HAVE THEIR USES. Chinese eggs preserved in a solution of boracic acid are declared good even after 100 years, by a professor of biological chemistry, in a suit at law brought by a New York importer against an ex-collector of the port to recover $12,000 lost through the destruction in 1908 of a consignment of eggs so preserved, which the collector declared unfit for human food. A cake made with ten-year-old eggs was passed around in the court room and sampled with expressions of satisfaction.

BREAKING THE MAIL BLOCKADE. With some fifty steamships, which should be doing service between this and other countries and England, tied up at the docks of the latter country by the dock laborers' strike, it was believed that outgoing mails from America would be few and far between, but the first break in the situation occurred when the Rydam of the Holland-American Line departed with British mail March 10, and on March 13 the White Star liner Arabic arrived at New York from Liverpool with over 8,000 sacks of mail and more than 500 passengers. This is said to be the largest quantity of mail ever brought here from England; destroyers convoyed the Arabic far out to sea as a protection.

TO SAVE THE CENSORS' TIME. Since the cutting of direct cable communication between America and Germany by the British early in the war, we have been dependent upon wireless communication for war matter from Germany, and much that has come from England is by wireless, in both cases rigidly censored. According to the Boston Transcript, the first direct communication between the United States and a neutral nation in Europe since the war began, is about to be established by way of a Marconi wireless station at Cape Cod with a corresponding station on the coast of Norway, and early operation of this service is expected.

PLUNGED 3,000 FEET TO DEATH. While executing his famous drop from a height of 3,000 feet above the waters of San Francisco Bay on Sunday, March 14, in the presence of an enormous Panama-Pacific Exposition crowd, Lincoln Beachy, one of the foremost of the world's aviators, plunged to his death in the waters of the bay, the wings of his German Taube monoplane crumpling under the strain put upon them when the aviator, at the end of his perpendicular drop, threw in his effort to straighten out in the graceful sweep he had often successfully negotiated in his own biplane. Beachy was thirty years of age, and had performed many hair-raising feats in air in previous exhibitions and also just before his attempt. The machine and driver fell into the bay from the aviator's brother, and a special crew ship Oregon rescued the wrecked monoplane strapped in the seat, after several hours of search.

"Anxious," Trenton, N. J. May we pray with the same assurance that our heavenly Father will answer our prayers for others as well as those for ourselves? 1 John 5: 14, 15 states that if we ask anything "according to his will" he hears and grants the petition. I have been greatly distressed about one very dear to me. In some ways the case seems hopeless, but I still cling to the promises. God has wonderfully answered many prayers and given me hope times without number. I do praise him for this with all my heart, and am seeking to live only for him. But this dear one's salvation I feel I must be assured of or at times I feel that I cannot live.

We know that God is concerned for those who are still rejecting him even more than we can be, and loves them even more than we can love them. We can have greater influence to bring our dear ones to Christ if we have a cheerful, bright, trustful experience. We must remember, however, that God does not save people against their wills. In all our interpretations of Scripture we must be reasonable, interpreting each passage in the light of all the rest. The promise in John, then, cannot mean that God will save one who refuses to be saved. So we cannot always pray for others with the same assurance as we pray for ourselves, for we have not control of their wills, as we have of our own. But sometimes the assurance may come from the Holy Spirit that a friend is going to yield, just as evangelists often have assurances in prayer that certain campaigns will result in great spiritual victory. Keep on praying; keep on trusting that God will do every possible thing to win your friend's love; let him see in you a peace and joy and confidence that will attract and win him. There will probably still be seasons of intense, passionate intercessory prayer, and in some such season you may receive the assurance that your friend is about to yield to the Saviour. Don't say or think that the case is "hopeless." There are no such cases. Christ can reach and save and forgive and bless "whosoever will."

Bible Student, Pekin, Ind. Please explain the following apparent discrepancies in the accounts of Paul's conversion: Acts 9: 7: "The men which journeyed with him stood still, hearing a voice but seeing no man"; Acts 22: 9: "They that were with me saw indeed the light, and were afraid; but they heard not the voice of him that spake to me." Again, Acts 26: 14: "When we were all fallen to the earth, I heard a voice," etc. Acts 9: 7: "The men which journeyed with him stood speechless."

The first two statements evidently mean that while all indeed heard the sound of the voice no one but Paul could distinguish the words. The latter difference has been explained by saying that at first the men all fell to the ground and the rest hurriedly got to their feet and "stood" while Paul remained prostrate on the ground listening to the voice. The statement in Acts 9: 7 that the men "stood" follows the narration of the whole conversation of Jesus with Paul. While this was going on the men who had at first fallen with Paul (26: 14) stood watching their companion, who still knelt or lay on the ground. Conybeare and Howson say: "The whole scene was evidently one of the utmost confusion; and the accounts are such as to express, in the most striking manner, the bewilderment and alarm of the travelers."

Reader, Wisconsin. How much of the Lord's work ought a Christian to do—one who has a home to care for? I would like your opinion as to how much God expects his people to do.

God expects his people to give their lives unreservedly and absolutely to his service. Whether one is at work in the home or in the church, there should be the consciousness that the work is being done for God. "Whatsoever ye do, in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus." (Col. 3: 17.) The question how much time should be given to God's service in the home and how much to God's service in church and community must be settled in individual conscience. "Duties never conflict." There is always one thing to do which is God's will. God wants done at that particular time. It is probably true that a mother's first duty is to her home, though there are exceptions. A woman may be called to broader work, and every mother must cultivate a deep interest in the needs and sufferings of those outside the home circle and do all she can to relieve them. But women who are kept close at home should not feel that their lives are being wasted. They are training lives which may bless multitudes. Susanna Wesley was a true mother and homemaker, doing her work there and giving to the church and the world two great spiritual leaders. Home must be kept bright, neat, happy, cheerful, worshipful. Church and community duties which unfit women for their work at home, or take them too much away from their children, should not be undertaken.

J. W. G., Slingerlands, N. Y. The flag, as originally designed by the Flag Committee appointed by the Continental Congress, proved unsatisfactory, not being considered sufficiently distinctive. A committee of three, including General Washington, Robert Morris and Colonel George Ross, took the matter of a new flag under consideration. A rough sketch was made, the design showing thirteen stripes in alternate red and white, with thirteen stars set in a circle in a field of blue. Betsy Ross, (Colonel Ross's niece) was asked to make the flag according to the design. At this stage of the discussion, the question was raised whether the mother must cultivate a deep interest in the needs and sufferings of those outside the home circle and do all she can to relieve them. But women who are kept close at home should not feel that their lives are being wasted. They are training lives which may bless multitudes. Susanna Wesley was a true mother and homemaker, doing her work there and giving to the church and the world two great spiritual leaders. Home must be kept bright, neat, happy, cheerful, worshipful. Church and community duties which unfit women for their work at home, or take them too much away from their children, should not be undertaken.

Reader, Long Beach, Wash. Would it be right for a member of one church to join a church of another denomination, whose doctrine differed from his own, and parts of which he does not believe—providing there is no church of his own denomination where he lives. Would it be right to enter the other church in such case?

Much would depend upon the nature of the differences referred to. If they relate to non-essentials and nowise conflict with the fundamentals of the Christian faith, then you could worship with the members and call them brethren. There is a strong and growing tendency toward interdenominational brotherhood. If the differences are vital, denying the divinity of Christ, the atonement, the resurrection, and the Gospel message, such teaching should be avoided. It is possible, however, that you have formed a wrong impression, and that the difference may only be in some minor matter of rious and has always puzzled B. In the early days of the Christian era there were several writings on the subject to describe the exaltation of the saints. The pre-Christian fathers whom he describes had and brought into paradise writings have long ago been accepted as canonical and apocryphal. 2. Timothy 2: 4, while it declares that all men should be saved and knowledge of the truth, plainly leaves acceptance of the individual. Grace is a free gift, it is not a forerunner. It is not thrust upon any man. He desires it, seek it, pray for it, it should be observed that Paul, in Timothy, implies the possibility of rejection or rejection. 3. The able hold that "although Christ rose with appearance like the natural body, a mysterious change which was effected from the fact that Mary failed to (see John 20: 15). He rose with attributes of a spiritual body, as distinguished from the natural body; of an incorruptible body from a corruptible body. Phil. 3: 21; Col. 3: 4.) When he have touched him, therefore, he gently. The crown of his life would be completed. This evidently completes the significance of the change and the disciples.

Mrs. A. K. Bery writes from Iowa, to ask if any one can tell her of her daughter, Mrs. A. A. Walter. Her address was care of Eagle Lumber Co., Timber, Ore.

Mrs. C. D. Stone, 393 Seventh St., N. Y., an aged "shut-in," would be cheered if a few Christian Herald papers each send her a friendly postal on her birthday, March 30. She has been years a member of our Family Circle.

R. J. S., Kinsman, Ohio. The letter. Fortunately, industrial conditions improving. The government is making efforts towards relieving the situation, and village authorities could help by trying to give work to as many unemployed as possible.

C. H. F., Delhi, Iowa. The bread question is not so largely with the dealers as with the bakers themselves. The agitation has shown that manufacturers have refused to serve retailers, unless the price of the loaf, even when it makes themselves feel this to be unjust.

G. C., Ben's Run, W. Va., writes: reading in a recent Christian Herald that this country is making fire-arms for exportation to be shipped to the warring nations, I think this should not be done. In the word, it is making more widows and orphans to be fed and clothed."

F. M., St. Louis, Mo. The United States and Canada together have 10,000 missionaries in foreign fields; Great Britain has about the same number; France, 120; Holland, many 12,000; Switzerland, 450; and 700. These figures are exclusive of missionaries and helpers, of whom there is a greater army in the mission fields than of white workers.

Another correspondent, Rev. J. K. King, writes: "I am convinced that the use of 'dad' or 'daddy' as a substitute for papa or father, has not arisen from any motive than sincere affection. It is sometimes 'Tad' or 'Thad' is the word for father in Welsh, and is used as such in the Prayer in the Welsh New Testament. 'Dad' or 'daddy' has come to us through intermarriage of Welsh and English. It is really an affectionate term of our language."

J. B., New York. There are many American ports at the present time. German and eleven Austrian merchant ships with a total tonnage exceeding 500,000 tons, an aggregate market value far in excess of all the United States merchant ships are likely to visit the naval war zone in Europe. The fact that such a large portion of Germany's merchant marine is situated has been pointed out as a strong argument against the theory that Germany has any purpose of singling out American shipping for special attacks.

stars should be five-pointed or six-pointed. The stars in Washington's family coat-of-arms were five-pointed. He argued that such a star was difficult to make, whereupon Betsy Ross said: "If the stars have any points, they are five-pointed, and nothing is easier to make than one of that style." While speaking she took up a piece of bunting, folded it two or three times and with a single clip of her scissors cut a perfect five-pointed star. It was quite distinctive from the English star, which had six points. The five-pointed star was then definitely decided on, and the first American flag showing these stars was officially adopted by Congress June 14, 1777. Such is the story of the flag, as written by John Quincy Adams (a lineal descendant of the famous Adams family of Revolutionary days) for the Christian Herald several years ago. Our flag is, in a sense, the evolution of the combined flags of the colonies, each of which had its own emblem during the exciting times from 1760 to 1775, although none of them had the stars. We know of no historical record of any American starry flag of earlier date.

The Mail-Bag of February 17 contained a letter from a reader in Michigan, who sent a little paragraph commenting on the use of the appellation "dad" to a father. W. A. R., Superior, Wis., this week sends a reply to the article in question. He writes: "I call my father 'dad' and taught my daughters to call me 'daddy.' I do not want them to call me 'father.' I do not want them to act on their dignity with me. 'Daddy' is more chummy, and I hope always to be my daughters' chum. I can conceive of them romping with 'daddy,' but 'father' is too dignichurch government or of ceremonial form. It would be a great mistake to misjudge in such a case without due cause. It must be remembered, however, that there are some denominations which make it obligatory on their members to go to their churches or to none, and in such a case we cannot advise, as that is a matter for the individual conscience.

C. M. L., Locklies, Va. Will you tell me something about "Dives" through the Mail-Bag? I can't find the word in any concordance I have, nor in the Bible.

It is not in the Bible. The only name mentioned in any of the parables is that of Lazarus (Luke 16: 20-25). The "certain rich man" in this parable, nameless in Scripture, gradually came to be known in early religious literature as Dives, a name suited to one of his wealthy station, and now inseparably connected with the parable wherever it is mentioned. It is a remarkable instance of the manner in which a descriptive adjective has been transformed to the name of an individual.

F. A. T., Etna, Me. There is little in the Scriptures to throw light on the question "where was the spirit of Jesus during the three days his body lay in the tomb?" Among the early writers, and by many of later days, the subject has been discussed. The Apostles' Creed says: "He descended into hades" (the place of departed spirits). Some theologians, Dean Alford among them, in discussing the passage in 1 Peter 3: 19, 20, contended that Christ, in the interval between his death and resurrection, preached or announced his finished work to the spirits "in prison"; but the passage is myste-

THE LITTLE DEACONESS' STORY

"We do get very much mixed sometimes. It was a Presbyterian city missionary that first told us about Mrs. Jansen and it was a Baptist doctor who was so good to her and the child and it was an Irish Catholic priest that came in and scrubbed the beautifully and wouldn't take a penny. And I—I'm a Methodist nurse, you know! Laugh? Yes, I laughed a dozen times as I've heard of the mixture. But it isn't at the oddity of it, it's because I'm glad—yes, very glad the denominational lines are so low that we walk right over sometimes and never know where! I think it's a good don't you?"

"I'm a nurse. Too small to be a nurse. I've been told so a thousand times I'm little, I admit, but I'm not well, and I love my work. I said they wouldn't take me to the hospital—that was six years ago—because I wasn't a Goliath, but Miss Barclay, the superintendent, called me into her room and she all over—my, but I did and she asked me if I was wanted to be a nurse. And I had dreamed of it ever since my girl and heard my mother about Florence Nightingale. Then she told me if I was sure I wanted to be a deaconess. And I felt the tears go my eyes because it wasn't what I "wanted" to be one—no, I didn't—but that I knew God had led me to be one. But I steadied myself and told her that I did. And she had seen that I was very earnest, for she put her hand over mine and the next I knew I was accepted. And all the three years of my training I never missed a day of illness—not a single day! I haven't missed many days in the years since—except that I had diphtheria—oh, yes, we nurses haven't any guarantee of "catching" things any more than our nurses. We don't get the gas diseases often, though, because we have been taught how to take care of ourselves."

"You more about Mrs. Jansen? I wish you could have been there when I opened the door into the little room in which they were—mother and four children. Her mother had died a little while before they were dreadfully poor. Her mother was lying on a mattress in the corner moaning with pain so sick to notice anything; but I saw her at first for the child—there was a little round sheet—under which there was a poor woman late in the fall and cold. The door was open and a little about six was sitting on a stool holding a tiny baby. She was trying to warm its little feet and at the same time—it was only a few days old. The two little drumsticks of red legs stuck out at the fire. A little thing was kicking and crying and gasping as the girl held it with a beer bottle to its lips and tried to make it drink cold milk! There were two more children, one of the other two. They were huddled up against the knees of the mother, watching the performance with big eyes. It was better than a picture show to them. Maggie told me afterward—that was the name of the six-year-old—that she had heard somewhere that a little baby should be fed out of a bottle! And she was doing the very best she knew how. Of the little convenience that goes on the mouth of the bottle before it becomes acceptable to a baby she had never heard. The baby was black in the face with choking. I didn't stop to take my bonnet off before I seized it. I rubbed its little feet a bit—they were like ice—warmed them the best I could and wrapped them in some flannel that I had brought in my nurse's satchel. It stopped its crying, and I put it way back on the table, told the children not to touch it till I came back, and rushed down to the nearest drug store for the—convenience! Yes, and to telephone to the Home, too, for I saw in a moment that I needed some clean sheets and other things—more than I had in my nurse's satchel. It did not take but a minute.

WHEN I got back the baby was still quiet, and I was afraid it was dead. But when I got the milk prepared and warmed you should have seen the little thing drink! I really think it was the first food it had taken in all its life, and it was three days old! Well, I rubbed it gently, warmed it and wrapped it up again and it went to sleep—as all tired babies should do when they are comfortable. I laid it over on the farther side of the table again—there wasn't any other place. The only furniture in the room consisted of the stool the little girl had been sitting on, the stove, the mattress and this old wooden table.

Just then there was a knock at the door, and the Presbyterian city missionary brought in a big basket of food. He stopped just long enough to tell me that he was glad I was there—he "didn't think there was any hope for the mother, but the children ought to be looked after." The children gathered around the basket—he had brought baskets before—and I knew they were hungry. I hated to let the sick woman wait, but I took some of the things out on the table—buns and butter and cookies and a quart jar of milk; I remember thinking that whoever put up the basket must have had children himself—and the children stood around with outstretched hands. I checked them a moment and said, "Don't you think we ought to thank the One who gives us these things?" and said grace. I made it short, the children staring at me. Then the two younger ones began ravenously on their buns, but the little girl looked at me, her eyes big with solemn childish reproach, and said, "I don't think that man would like to have you call him God!"

You don't understand? Neither did I at first. It took some questioning to unravel the working of the child's mind. But I found that she knew nothing whatever of God except as she had heard the name in connection with vile words on the street, and when I said "the One who brought us these things," she thought I meant the city missionary who had brought the basket; and her loyal little heart resented the idea that this friend should be called by an odious name! Heathenism? Of course it is—the blackest heathenism. But I've found it right here in this city, and right under our church spires, again and again. Not in children alone either. I found a boy of nineteen once, who did not know enough about Jesus to trust him for salvation.

Well, the children once eating, I had time for the woman. She was desperately sick, temperature 105, and had been utterly neglected—nobody to do anything for her since the baby was born, but that little six-year-old! It was pretty near hopeless, but I worked and I prayed. They sent me supplies and reinforcements from our home and the good Baptist doctor came twice a day. "We must pull her through if we can," he said more than once, "for the sake of the children." And I did my level best—oh, I just like such cases as that—where I have to pull them literally from the jaws of death! I feel the real joy of battle, and I'm not often conquered. Unless, indeed, the patient is really hopeless before I get hold of her.

Just what I did? Oh, a lot of things. I bathed her and cleaned up her bed—oh, it was dreadful! Things you could not even imagine! Then I telephoned the city agent, and as soon as he could send it a neat little iron bed came—you see, the poor creature had pawned the other to get food for the children. Then the United Charities helped nobly—that's a great organization. And the Visiting Nurses' Association sent a nurse to "spell" me when I had to go home to sleep. And a neighboring restaurant keeper never let me pay a cent for my meals all the time I was on the case. And the Irish woman stole time from her own little brood again and again to scrub the floor. Oh, I must tell you—this woman happened to come in once after Mrs. Jansen was most well, just as I was praying with her. I rose from my knees, rather expecting ridicule or some kind of an outburst, but my red-haired Irish woman was wiping her eyes with a corner of her apron, and I heard her say softly, "Shure, an' may all the saints bliss 'em!" Oh, there are kind hearts if people only knew of their neighbor's need. And our orphanage took all the children and kept them till the mother was quite well again. For she got well—oh, yes. Three months from the time the Presbyterian missionary told us of the case Mrs. Jansen stood at the altar of a little church and united with God's people. They have rallied to her assistance most nobly, finding her work and helping her over the hard places. She's keeping her little family together—she's a nice little woman and is making a brave fight.

There's a great deal of talk about social service lately, and I believe in it from the bottom of my heart. We must work for the betterment of the community in which we live, right along with our efforts to better individuals. We must have better laws, cleaner streets, more playgrounds, all sorts of neighborhood improvements. But do you know, I can't after all think of any better service for society than to save the life of the mother of four children, and to help her in her noble efforts to be self-supporting and self-respecting.

W. E. BIEDERWOLF, evangelist, during his campaign in Alton, Ill., made the offer of $100 to the person or persons who could prove as false or misstated any of the facts or quotations used in his lecture on the subject of Christian Science. Mr. Branney came to claim the reward. Dr. Bieders and Mr. Casey each selected two men in turn selected a fifth, the five were a jury to hear Mr. Casey's arguments and Bieders' defense. The decision was in favor of Dr. Bieders, the jury sustaining all the points presented.

OF OUR READERS who are members of the denomination of Friends (Quakers) have written us giving some interesting statistics concerning their denomination which were not included in the Christian Herald Almanac for the current year, although we would have printed them gladly had they been sent to us in time. Mr. C. W. Dickinson of Pensacola, Fla., writes: "The Society of Friends has foreign missions in many countries. It also has professional ministers." Mr. Luke Woodward of Fountain City, Ind., another member of the same society, writes: "We have missions in India, China, Japan, Africa, West India Islands, Syria, Mexico and Alaska. We have disciplinary rules in regard to recognizing and officially recording our ministers." Mr. S. E. Nicholson, editor of the American Friend, Richmond, Ind., is authority for the statement that of the 140,000 Friends in the United States 100,000 are Orthodox Friends, while the others are divided up into two or three branches. We are glad to print these additional facts concerning the society as a matter of general information.

SAUL REJECTED BY THE LORD

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR APRIL 4. I SAM. 15

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice." I Sam. 15: 22.

Obedience is better than sacrifice, but it is a sacrifice of an inner and deeper sort. You cannot obey without sacrificing your own will and way; and the more exacting the obedience is, the more suffering and sacrifice it will involve. "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit!" "It is much easier," says Matthew Henry, "to bring a bullock or a lamb to be burnt upon the altar than to bring every high thought into obedience to God, and make the will subject to his will." We find not uncommonly that those who are consciously leading a sinful life are diligent in outward religious acts, and will even use the fruit of their disobedience as sacrifice to the Lord, under the impression that it may compensate for their other shortcomings. "But hath the Lord as much delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying his voice?" "To love him with all the heart is more than whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices." You may have no gift to bring, but bring your obedience as an offering for the altar. It will be graciously welcomed. When an officer of the engineers urged that the directions he had received were impossible to execute, the Duke of Wellington replied: "Sir, I did not ask your opinion; I gave you my orders, and I expect them to be obeyed."

The Obedience of Christ

By Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell

SSAUL enjoyed the religion of conventionality and ceremony, rather than that of heart obedience. He was taught that loving obedience was better than sacrifice and that forms of religious service will not answer as an excuse for disobedience, any more than doing good with stolen money will quiet the cry of conscience. Saul had been warned before regarding his unfaithfulness, but he was like some men who, as Spurgeon said, seem to have India rubber hearts—touch them and they respond, but soon resume their former position. Samuel called Saul's sins by the right name—idolatry, iniquity, stubbornness and sinfulness. By these Saul lost his kingdom and Jonathan his heirship to the throne.

But there is mercy with the heavenly Father. When sin and death came by the disobedience of Adam, righteousness and resurrection came by the obedience of Christ. The promise took effect immediately. "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head."

Jesus said: "I come to do thy will, O God!" In youth he was about his Father's business. His meat was to do God's will and to finish his work, and his dying words were, "It is finished!" Christ's obedience was perfect. He fully answered for Adam's fall; yea, more, for "where sin abounded, grace did much more abound." Instead of Adam in his purity battling with the tempter, now it is Christ in man winning the victory. Instead of man living above the power of death, it is the God-man conquering death. Instead of God visiting man in Eden, it is man dwelling with God in the heavenly Eden. Instead of innocence, it is victory by mighty conflict, life out of death. Instead of being lord of earth, it is reigning with Christ on the throne of his glory. Instead of knowing God as our Creator, we see him as the world's Redeemer, imparting infinite love and power. We are not only the children of our heavenly Father, but the bride of Christ and joint heirs with him to his eternal inheritance. He died that we might live, but a dead Christ could not empower his church. He must conquer death as well as sin, that his people may exclaim, "I know that my Redeemer liveth!" So that Paul could write, "For he hath abolished death and brought life and immortality to light in the Gospel."

Though we do not now see the face of our Lord as the wondering disciples did after his resurrection, as the women did at the sepulcher, as Peter did alone in his confession, as the five hundred did on the mount, as the early church did when he went home from Mount Olivet, or as, last of all, Paul did when he cried, "Who art thou, Lord?" and the gentle answer, "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest," yet we see the power and power of his resurrection and far surpassing moral expression. We have seen the Lord"—his soul presence, his saving arm of power, his cleansing blood, his pardoning love; and we have heard his voice, with infinite tenderness, saying, "Thy sins, which are many, are all forgiven thee." "Go in peace!"

Calvary had to be supplanted with the resurrection, or Christianity would have died at its birth. Every living church is a proof of the reality and glory of the risen Christ. Every Christian experience is a personal evidence that Jesus, who lives in the believing heart, is alive forever more. Christ's resurrection answers the question of all the ages: "If a man die, shall he live again?" Hope was born at Jesus' bursting tomb. Since that hour humanity has shouted victory over death, hell and the grave. We worship at no shrine of departed glory, but at the feet of the living Christ, and we know that "when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, we also shall appear with him in glory." The disciples at Pentecost knew Jesus had reached the eternal home when the baptism of the Holy Spirit fell upon them.

Oh that the churches would roll away the stones! the stones of formalism from the grave of spirituality, the stone of ignorance and superstition from the sepulcher of the souls of heathendom, the stone of militarism from the tomb of national freedom! May the day soon appear when the infinite Christ will speak to lifeless forms in church and state, and cry, "Come forth!" so that the kingdoms of this world will become the redeemed and liberated kingdoms of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.

O Saul, it shall be

A face like my face that receives thee; a Man like to me
Thou shalt love and be loved by, forever; a hand like this hand Shall throw open the gates of new life to thee!
See the Christ stand!

Love and Obedience

By Arthur H. Howland

IN STUDYING these Old Testament lessons the teacher should frequently remind the pupils of the crude and low standards of the times, which explain many of the things that sound strange to our ears, familiar as they are with the sayings of Jesus. In the chapter studied today appear these startling words: "Now go and smite Amalek and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling." We must remember, in reading such words as these, that the ancient prophets thought of God as a "man of war." They lacked the light which Jesus brought to earth, the light which reveals the infinite tenderness of Jehovah. We get the best picture of God when we see Jesus with the children upon his knee and hear him saying, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." We see God today through the atmosphere of the love of Jesus and understand him better than the people could have understood him who lived before he came.

Indeed, the bringing over into the Christian era of these warlike conceptions of God has doubtless been one of the contributing causes of the present bloody war in Europe. American children must be taught that our God is not a God of war, but of peace; not a God of hate, but of love; not a death-dealing monster, but a life-giving Friend. Tell the children what Jesus said about God. Make them feel the breath of Jesus upon their faces, his touch upon their fingers. Show them Jesus weeping over the sad city, dying upon the cross, rising from the dead to be their Saviour and their Friend and to lead them forth to paths of cheerful helpfulness.

As to Saul's disobedience, the whole history of Saul shows him to have had a rebellious, self-confident soul. Humble and teachable at first, he seems to have been spoiled by his honors, and failed to understand his need of God. He failed to learn that fundamental lesson: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

The words of Samuel are both true and sad: "Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams. For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry."

Rebellion and stubbornness; how they hinder and spoil our work! If a girl is going to master music she must first become its slave, surrendering her whole being to the principles and the ideals of music. If a boy is to master a trade or a profession he must give himself up to it. If a man is to be a great leader of the people, he must surrender himself to the welfare of the people. If one is to be a Christian and a Christian worker he must surrender himself altogether to the will and the voice of God.

Many of us have a hard time with our Christian experience because we are busy going around finding and making "sacrifices" instead of simply and sweetly obeying Christ. His yoke is easy and his burden is light, because it is the yoke of love.

Compare the Old Testament Saul with the New Testament Saul. King Saul was disobedient to the heavenly vision and lost his kingdom and his crown. Saul of Tarsus, evidently by nature a stiff-willed man, laid down his will and his hopes at the feet of the risen Christ whom he met on the Damascus road. To his heavenly vision he was not disobedient, and the last view we have of him is as he is reaching out his hands to receive the heavenly crown which the Lord, for whom he has labored and suffered and at last died, stands ready to bestow.

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.

Member of Syria Mission

THE immovable East furnishes almost exact counterparts of Saul as king in the persons of the "emirs" or hereditary princes of the Bedawin. Saul had no palace; our lesson two weeks ago left him dwelling under a pomegranate tree. He had no system of government and his rashness and selfwill proved his ruin. He had no capital city, but went and came about Gilgal, where he was anointed king by Samuel.

For many years I have counted among my friends a certain emir of the Bedawin whom I have visited in his tents and who has been a guest in our home at Beirut. He was a fine looking man with courtly manners, sober speech and untutored natural dignity. His little kingdom was the Jaulan, the ancient Golan, east of the Jordan. He dwelt in tents, moving from place to place among the hills and the Jordan valley, judging his people, fighting their battles against their neighboring enemies, the Druzes and Circassians, and other hostile Bedawin, until his death by accident three years ago. His unworthy son, who succeeded him, was a cruel headstrong fellow who, having lost some

Leadership Training Class

Th last nine years the adult Bible class movent has come into being. About three tionen are now enrolled in these classes ney as many women.

he ovement has become a profound innce a) in giving dignity and strength to Suary school; (b) in holding the older s; as an evangelistic, temperance and sion force; (d) in promoting attendance men on the church service; (e) in supply-teachers for the Sunday school.

he ult Department in the Sunday school fots unit the adult class, and the class ge the button with a white heart and a indicating purity and sacrifice.

Department Organization.

hefer possible the classes composing the it Department should have separate opening elog exercises even where there are but oraree such classes, or in the individual i, i is a large one, there are good reasons theeparate exercises. It is scarcely rea-ble to expect the songs acceptable to the forid other departments will attract the ts. The school notices are often of no in- at adults. The whole range of needs is ter. And especially should additional time dard for in connection with class discus- s, a lesson teaching, and this necessarily d breviate the opening and closing exer-

For the closing exercises euld be some special music in the form olquartet or instrumental music, and a fress by some man of standing in the rtint or community on a topic related to lean. The appeal for a personal decision Clst should not be omitted, for men and ere frequently nearer to these decisions rch influences than we dream.

la Organization.

teass should be organized with the State rncial Sunday School Association recog- m/ certificate. A class name and motto lde chosen, and a class song should be tely one of the members and used on rial occasions.

ommittees are suggested: Executive, bhip, Devotional, Social and Mission- e teacher has charge of the lesson, and ol, president presides on Sunday and at ss sessions. The executive committee is of the class president, teacher and chairman of the class committees. The mem- bership committee secures new members and visits absentees and sick. The devotional or spiritual committee arranges for the devotional exercises, cottage prayer meetings and Gospel services for men where needed. The social com- mittee introduces new to old members and plans for functions and entertainments. The annual class banquet is a recognized feature of such work. The missionary committee cares for the benevolent work of the neighborhood and for some class work upon the foreign field and brings regular information to the class of their work.

In large classes captains are sometimes ap- pointed over groups of ten to report regarding non-attendance, sickness and non-employment.

3. Activities.

The activities of these classes cover a wide range of service, including athletics, employ- ment, civic improvement, temperance, agita- tion, hospital and institution visitation, provid- ing of substitute teachers, support of students on the foreign field. The International Sunday School Association publishes a pamphlet on 100 activities of organized classes.

4. Parents' Classes.

A new and interesting feature of the Adult Department is the formation of mothers' classes and fathers' classes. A good point for the be- ginning of such classes is with fathers and mothers of the Beginners' and Primary Depart- ments, for these are often in attendance with their children. As the children are promoted, organize new classes from the new crop of younger fathers and mothers.

5. Advertising the Class.

Many of the members of the adult class are salesmen and business men. They are putting the adult class goods before the community in attractive forms. These forms can be found in The Adult Worker and His Work, and the other adult books mentioned in this article.

A favorite plan is to institute a membership campaign, dividing the class into two bands for this purpose and setting a goal as to time or membership. Some classes regularly advertise the class in the local press to attract strangers, or by electric and other signs on the school building.

6. Community Survey.

A splendid plan is to institute a community survey, dividing up the community among the class to get new members, and to ascertain the location of saloons, pool rooms and amusement places. To know the actual conditions will often start the classes toward community reforms and the supplying of wholesome community recrea- tion. Members of the class should be in touch with the courts in order to become big brothers or sisters to first offenders.

7. Class Federations.

The executive committee of the classes or the officers of the department should plan for an annual parade of the adult classes in federation with other adult classes of the city or commu- nity. The very exhibit of the strength of these classes is a wholesome influence upon public officials and attracts others to the Sunday school.

8. Lesson Courses.

There is now in the market a large variety of Bible courses, many of them brief, for adult classes. The mere statement of the books available would make an impressive list. This list can be obtained by writing the International Y. M. C. A., 124 East Twenty-eighth Street, New York; the Student Y. W. C. A., 600 Lex- ington Avenue, New York, and the International Sunday School Association, 1416 Malters Build- ing, Chicago, Ill. The Bible should be at the heart of these studies, for it has been found from experience that this is necessary for the sus- taining strength of a class organization.

Besides one of the books of the lists on Sunday school organization mentioned in previous lec- tures, one of the following specialization books should be studied by adult workers: The Adult Worker and His Work (Barclay); The Adult Bible Class (Pearce); The How Book (Hud- son); The Organized Adult Bible Class (Cun- ningham). For collateral reading: Adult Bible Classes (Wood-Hull); Adult Bible Classes: Forms of Organization (Hazard); Fishin' fer Men (Dr. Joseph Clark); The Efficient Lay- man (Cope); The Organized Adult Bible Class (Methodist Board of Sunday Schools).

While waiting for him I had view of the boys there, and as they came if the cold and wet for shelter and some d buns, I was strongly reminded of the prodigal son. I had a Christian in my pocket. One young fellow, with missing, who looked, like the weather, quite gloomy, attracted my attention, and I handed him my copy of the Christian Herald. I showed him my article about not being a 'quitter.' He read it, and it seemed to hit his case, for it livened him up. Jeff himself ap- peared now. You would not take him to be a hobo. He acted more like the business man- nager of a factory. I had a few words with him as I handed him the Bible, telling him that it would do him and all the boys who stopped here good to read it. A quiet smile stole over his face. I imagine he was much surprised. He thanked me, and said he would read it. I asked them if they would like to have the Christian Herald every week for three months, and the answer was 'yes.' I hope and pray it will be the means of getting some of those boys to write to their mothers and to lead them to seek the Christ who died for them."

A YELLOW ROSE GARDEN

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

THE lady next to me dropped her muff to the floor, and, as I stooped to regain it, she laughed gently.

"It's so crowded here," she murmured, "it's so very crowded that one can't very well help dropping things! I wonder where they will ever be seated?"

As I glanced around the old-fashioned drawing-room, with its Oriental rugs, its carved cabinet, and its heavily-framed portraits of men and women, I too wondered where folk were going to find room. True, there were some hundreds of wiggly camp chairs in orderly rows; but they were fast being filled with rustly ladies in silk and satin and furs—ladies who perfumed the air with the waxen gardenias and spicy carnations that added a note of color to their dark suits.

"I wonder," said the lady next to me, as she motioned vaguely with her program, "I wonder whether this crowd of people are amateur gardeners or Child Welfare League members."

Another lady leaned forward hurriedly and answered the question. "I," said the lady, "am more interested in gardens."

I bit my lip. I was interested in gardens too, but I was rather more interested in children.

It was the first of a series of four lectures that I was attending, lectures on "Successful Gardening," given by Mrs. Herbert Harde, a successful amateur gardener. The proceeds, which from the size of the crowd would be rather large, were to go to the International Child Welfare League.

Somehow, as I sat silent in my chair, I felt that it was rather incongruously pleasing to realize that the flowers, which many pale-faced, sad-eyed babies of the East Side had never seen, would be the real cause of help for them.

A hush fell over the room, and somewhere in front chairs were pushed back hurriedly. I saw, over the heads perhaps of a hundred people, the soft fluffiness of a brown veil, the shaded daintiness of a brown hat. "Mrs. Harde—" said the lady who sat next to me.

My first impression was that Mrs. Harde wore attractive hats; my next, as she raised slender, gloved fingers to her veil, that her hands were not exactly my idea of a gardener's hands. For the rest—

SUDDENLY out of the stillness came a voice with a curiously appealing little accent. "Can you all—hear me?" asked the voice.

From the back of the room several other voices rose on the flower-scented air:

"No!" said the other voices emphatically.

"Perhaps," suggested some one, "if you stand on a chair—"

A chair was brought. It was a substantial mission-style chair with a high back. They stood it against a tall from-the-ceiling-to-the-floor mirror, and Mrs. Harde climbed up upon its firm support.

"My talk this afternoon," she said, "will be on 'A Yellow Rose Garden in the Making.'"

The lady next to me inclined her silvered head in my direction.

"I'm glad she stood on the chair," she murmured in a satisfied way; "she's so pretty!"

"I want you to know," Mrs. Harde was saying, "that a yellow rose garden need not be monotonous. There are thirty varieties of yellow roses—I have six here." She held them up, in pretty vases and baskets: a gorgeous bit of sunset color; a pale lemon-tinted bud; a delicate, almost buff beauty; a cream-colored full-blown specimen; a deep-gold tight blossom; and a flower that showed flecks of crimson and orange. "Only six," she said, "but there are thirty!"

Mrs. Harde was pretty! It struck me, as she stood on the high of some small girl waiting for parade, that she was not upon own yellow roses. A mass of golden, glittery hair was flung from her face and caught in a knot at the back of her neck; she smiled with two deep dimples each side; her eyes glowed with shadow of her hat. She was in a brown suit with a waist I think, made of gilt lace. Sunlight crept over her as it did to caress her, and it seemed that she sparkled. Maybe it was gold of her waist, or the softness of her hair, but I am inclined to think that it was her dimples.

YELLOW rose gardens are near-heavenly things. The Mrs. Harde told about had been in Devonshire, England, and enlarged and improved upon our New England states. They had beds of tall roses, out of little border roses; it had snail walks, a stone wall covered with graceful arches banded with Shower of Gold climbing roses planted together so that shades sometimes harmonized times contrasted; it even had a series of small pipes to water scientific baths to feed and c

There was a lady up in the room who was taking notes. Quite suddenly she took eyes from her flying pencil.

"But aren't roses hard to raise she questioned; 'don't they give great deal of trouble?'"

Little Mrs. Harde beamed from her high perch on the chair. "You have to understand love them," she smiled, "just would understand and love them."

The lady wrote it down, and in her notes.

Mrs. Harde had some very rare little garden hints that seemed to attract her enthusiastic audience. She suggested that amateur gardeners wick, dyed either red or brown, to tie their bushes instead of the customary raffia often unties, but lamp wicks do after the first wetting. She said that a common mistake is in planting too deep; she told them of a pasture enriched with greatly. She told about hellgramites, but spots the leaves, about other things that do not leave but cost horribly. She talked about a great many things that interested me, but somehow I could not think that the richly-grown were just whiling away the time if in answer to my silent questions Mrs. Harde spoke:

"A great many reporters have come up to ask if this gardening is a new thing," she said, "but I have told them. There are women sculptors and poets, why shouldn't there be women gardeners? I think that some women are born gardeners." The lady next to me nodded her head vehemently, and there was a rustling all over the room as heads were nodded.

That night I dreamed a wonderful swaying garden of roses, with Mrs. Harde walking through it slowly, smilingly. The light glittered on her hair, and because I must have had the Child Welfare League in mind, that a child-face nestled in the heart of each blossom.

Then McKinley himself thought was one followed.

The President is not specifically by the Constitution to the cabinet, he usually does all subjects of national or international importance. In connection with foreign affairs he is supposed to do more than this, and to some extent to be guided by the department in charge of foreign affairs. The State Department. In the four foreign relations every one in the name of the President. The secretary of state signs the treaties to our ministers and ambassadors and also the communications to foreign governments, but he phrases, "The President directs," "The President believes," "The President is of the opinion," etc. The President is the head of the American Government, and foreign governments can deal only with him.

He represents strained international relations with half the world at war, and the President in connection with foreign relations becomes of great importance. When a war breaks out the American people adopt a partisanship. Foreign affairs unfortunately, usually interest very little, and on that account policy is to become excited at moments which, if the circumstances had been followed from the beginning with intelligent interest, would seem so exciting. In cases where the power of the President is a restraining force on popular opinion. At the same time great influence affecting our relations with other countries must be determined by the President's power. What determines that they determine great results.

Congress is in session the President is to take confidence the committees of the House and Senate which have that subject when vital in connection with foreign governments. President Harrison, when we had a crisis with Chile which led to war, placed the whole matter before the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the chairman was not of the political party. President Cleveland, his Venezuelan message, relations with Great Britain strained, consulted with the leading members of the House and Senate committees. President McKinley, when the war with Spain came on, consulted freely with the leaders in Congress, both of his own party and of the opposing party. President Wilson has conferred with the House and Senate committees on several phases of our foreign relations during the past year.

There seems little danger that any President will go against Congress or the people in any vital matter of foreign policy. There was a President once, who came into high office through the vice-presidency, who caused much apprehension because of his personal habits, and the fear that when not himself he would precipitate the country into trouble. But that was a good while ago.

In situations like the present, with numerous foreign complications, it is naturally assumed that the President consults his cabinet before taking any important step. Yet such action could be taken by President Wilson without cabinet consultation if he chose. The notes sent to Great Britain on the question of the rights of our commerce and the misuse of the flag and to Germany on the blockade of the English Channel by submarines could have been sent without the approval of the secretary of state, but if the secretary of state found that the principles laid down were contrary to his convictions doubtless he would retire from the cabinet.

The existing situation inevitably draws attention to the great power of the President. He is commander-in-chief of the army and navy. He may not declare war without the assent of Congress, but the modern practice is such that countries may find themselves at war without formal declaration.

Avoiding war is one of the many heavy responsibilities that are imposed by circumstances on President Wilson. The whole foreign situation is so charged with danger that it imposes conservatism on the executive. At the same time there is the duty of upholding American rights. The thing for the American people to do in the crisis is to inform themselves fully of all phases of the developments, and to make up their minds deliberately on all matters relating to our policy. Calmly molded public opinion of this kind is both a restraining and a sustaining force to the executive in the exercise of his great powers and the discharge of his great responsibilities.

MY FLIER IN CHICKENS

MY MOTHER didn't want me to keep chickens. She said a great deal against my declared decision to buy some and raise eggs. She said more trouble than eggs. I would take a lot of pleasure in the young fries that would hatch out. I went ahead and set up my coop and chicken yard. I was worth of lumber making a coop that I afterward sold for 50 cents, that is anticipating.

Coop finished, I went down to the store and bought six hens and a rooster that were still intact. I would have saved money if I had had their legs amputated before I brought them home, but I didn't know it. I was also anticipating.

After the seven fowls loose in the yard began turning regular porcupines and bran into the fowls. They had fine appetites. Those old spears a kernel of corn at a time, and they stuck their heads under their wings, clear to their ears; they didn't seem interested in the corn. The first dollar's worth of corn netted about one dozen eggs. Of course they hadn't laid yet; they had to have time to get to their new home; so I cheerfully bought some more grain. I mentioned chickens to my mother. She said, "I-told-you-so" smile and her self-laudatory comments regarding her several and distinct prophecies were gall and bitterness to my youthful ego.

I was very hopeful, consistently expectant, over the egg prospect, but without much material encouragement. The hens got fat; but they didn't lay. I decided that they needed more exercise, and expressed myself accordingly; but my mother stipulated that said exercise must be taken under my personal supervision. She feared for her flower beds. Just as if a lot of geraniums and verbenas and sweet alyssum could possibly equal the edible value of one egg!

Well, I watched them, and they ran straight for those flower beds. I think they got their exercise; anyway, I got enough, but I didn't need it. Those hens found 4,659 ways of reaching the flower beds when I wasn't looking. I watched them every afternoon for a week. Then, one afternoon, there was a ball game on Casaday's lot. For three days I had kept those hens contentedly picking bugs off the grass in the north yard. They seemed to have forgotten all about the flower beds. Anyway, I found it possible to reach a logical conclusion to the effect that the hens were completely satisfied with the north yard, and that I might as well make better use of my time.

I was on third base, ready to steal

The Real Economy of Owning a Hupmobile

In the fact that the Hupmobile costs less to run lies another big attraction for the family. And its first cost is reasonable, too.

Because it is low enough to put the Hupmobile within reach of most families in position to consider owning a car.

But high enough to insure the quality that keeps Hupmobiles constantly in commission, and cuts repair costs right down to the bone.

That, mark you, is real economy.

No layups for repairs or serious adjustments—no big or frequent repair bills—save far more in a year than long mileage on gasoline and oil alone.

Hup economy, however, includes both.

Owners report that they average 18 miles on a gallon of gasoline. Factory records, covering all the Hupmobiles built, show the cost of repair parts to be under ¼ cent per mile on the basis of 8000 miles per car per year—a fair average.

Garaged at home, the Hupmobile can easily be cared for, and kept in tip-top shape, by your own son.

And he'll be proud and glad to do it; and to drive for Mother and Dad on all occasions.

The dealer will give you the names of Hupmobile owners you can ask about the car.

They will tell you of Hupmobile economy, its sturdiness, its wonderful service. Write for the 1915 Year Book, and have the local dealer show you the latest and best of all Hupmobiles.

FOOD QUESTION

Settled with Perfect Satisfaction.

It's not an easy matter to satisfy all the members of the family at meal time, as every housewife knows.

And when the husband can't eat ordinary food without causing trouble, the food question becomes doubly annoying.

An Illinois woman writes:

"My husband's health was poor, he had no appetite for anything I could get for him, it seemed.

"He suffered severely with stomach trouble, was hardly able to work, was taking medicine continually, and as soon as he would feel better would go to work again only to give up in a few weeks.

"One day, seeing an advertisement about Grape-Nuts, I got some and he tried it for breakfast the next morning.

"We all thought it was pretty good although we had no idea of using it regularly. But when my husband came home at night he asked for Grape-Nuts.

"It was the same next day and I had to get it right along, because when we would get to the table the question, 'Have you any Grape-Nuts?' was a regular thing. So I began to buy it by the dozen pkgs.

"My husband's health began to improve right along. I sometimes felt offended when I'd make something I thought he would like for a change, and still hear the same old question, 'Have you any Grape-Nuts?'

"He got so well that for the last two years he has hardly lost a day from his work, and we are still using Grape-Nuts."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

"home," when a clarion call came from the direction of our south yard. Some one was calling me. "Lou-ee! Come home!" came the call.

"I ca-a-an't!" I replied.

"Course you can't," agreed Bill Taylor, "whajuspose I'm catchin' this game for?"

"Lou-ee! Lou-ee! Come home this minute!" There was no mistaking the voice or the tone. It wasn't a call; it was a command.

Just then Clyde Brown sent a grounder flying somewhere, and I left third base in a cloud of dust. As I crossed the plate I heard one say, "Yrout!" but I knew that before he spoke. I was clear out and headed for that south yard and the flower beds.

I found my mother and the girl driving six over-heated hens over and across and around those flower beds, while the rooster went flapping and squawking at the end of the procession, I couldn't tell which end. Those hens, despite their sex, didn't understand the feminine sign language. "Shoo! shoo!" and the frantic waving of a gingham apron only terrified them. Figuratively speaking, they just lost their heads. Actually, the complete physical loss was narrowly averted.

After that, the hens got only an occasional respite from the confinement of their own yard. I didn't arrive at any logical conclusion; but I just got tired missing baseball and the swimming hole and the woods, for the moral and physical good of a parcel of hens. However, I kept on looking for eggs. That was fun. One hen had a penchant for laying her eggs, when she did lay, away back in the far corner of the coop. One Sunday morning I heard her familiar cackle and found the egg all right; but, in backing out, I caught the back of my new Sunday-go-to-meeting coat on a nail. I was backing strong and the nail had a good hold. My mother waited until Monday to say what she thought about it. That is, she saved most of it for Monday. She worked a lot of it off mending that tear, and, for weeks, every sight of the mend called for an encore.

The hens were still backward about laying. A friend of mine told me to feed them red pepper in the bran mash. He said it would stimulate them. I believed everything I heard then and, anyway, most anything was worth trying, so I put in a good liberal handful and, as I thought, mixed it in well.

I have read stories in which some rooster would scratch up a nice worm, and then would call the hens and look on, in a sort of fatherly way, while the hens fought for the worm. My rooster was not so thoughtful. If a hen got anything before he did, she had to hurry. When I scattered this pepper-filled mash, the rooster was on the job in one long jump. He saw a big lump and dove for it. It went down in one gulp.

My friend told me the pepper would stimulate the hens. The rooster was no hen, but he was greatly stimulated. He stretched his neck and blinked rapidly; then he made a rapid succession of involute curves with his head; then he backed off a step or two; then he flew up on the coop and crowed lustily four or five times. Finding he couldn't back away from the fire or blow it out, he started to run it down.

Around and around the coop he went. Head straight out in front, wings beating, crowing, cackling and saying everything in the chicken language fortissimo, he ran, flew and jumped, now up on the coop, now straight against the bars, now round and round again. The frightened hens ran to get out of his way; but his way was everywhere at once, and they were bowled over and over, almost as fast as they could gain their feet. At last they all gained the safe haven of the coop and left the yard clear for his stimulating exercise. I came back in about an hour and found him huddled in a corner of the yard, dead tired, but still blinking and still stretching his neck. (Oh, he got over it all right and outlived the hens, for a while.) The stimulation didn't seem to benefit the hens, at least it bore no tangible fruit in the shape of eggs.

I began to look around for hens to add to my pen. My friends had a young chick said was a hen. It looked like a hen. I had a new jack cost me 35 cents, and he of hen and a half dozen ja the knife. I looked at the hard; it was just right peg or making willow wh wanted the hen, so we tled and took her home.

Next morning my father "Come, here, son," he said a look at your new hen." There was, up on the coop, crowing for the world like a rooster. V she was a rooster, a rooste comb. I might have enj that chicken if folks had much to say about hens ar recall the unpleasant past never crowed again.

Suddenly the whole bu wanted to set all at one know what license they t had to set, they hadn't do to warrant it. Two of the the laying nests, and sat ar china eggs. When I tri them off, they gave me one look and sat still. The found places to their lik them in an old manger, ar two in hollows in the floor and there they sat, in all t feminine persistence. Fi determined, I bought som eggs gave them each a dozen; bht mind you. After feeding all winter I had to buy tings them, and it wasn't beca eaten many eggs either. T re one iota of justice in the those hens for offspring, l, as seemed greatly to desire it, did I could.

The first hen to come off six little yellow balls of ani tion. ing a mother, even if the were adopted, she was permitted he r the big yard; anyway, e flo weren't planted yet. A few lays I heard a dismal cheeping m the rection of the chicken yard and five little chickens; one of e six furnished an early break st yellow tom cat next doo stand disconsolately about the bo of a foster mother. I didn't low w ailed her, but she was dead. The day, I found one of the othe hens on her nest. Her eggs wer almost cubated, but had grown co, and whole dozen was a total is. I the other four hens decide they sat long enough. Another y or would have finished their ta, but they wouldn't go back. It as a of race suicide pure and sird. I wouldn't even scratch for t poor little orphans, and I finally g the my chum, whose one buff chain accepted them into her bro will a question. The four dese rs be to lay again in a desultor fash but, before they had reache two d eggs, they began dying off, com cause I could not locate. me circumstances, my mother to use those eggs; so, after a last died, she made me throw the all I threw them at the neighb is old low cat. Cruelty to anima No all. I didn't hit him.

We stewed the rooster, k I d find him very stimulating.

Twenty-six friends ask prayer that dear ones may be saved from the liquor habit, including one that two sons may be cured of this habit; another, two brothers.

A mother asks prayer that her son may be cured of the morphine habit; two friends, that their daughters may be cured of the drug habit; another, her sister-in-law; another, a brother-in-law.

Sixty-two friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing. Thirty friends ask prayer for the conversion of sons, including one that son, who is a soldier, may be thoroughly converted and enter into active service for the Master; another that son now at the front may be saved. Twenty-three wives ask prayer for the conversion of their husbands. Seventy-one friends ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives and friends, including two mothers, each asking that three daughters be saved; another that daughter may be saved and have more love for her; another for the conversion of an acquaintance going to war. Fifteen readers ask prayers for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends. Seventy-six friends ask prayer for healing for themselves, including one to regain the use of limbs; another to be restored and return home; another, that health may be restored so she may raise her child to be a true Christian; another, that lameness be cured; another, that limb may be healed, so that she may walk without a crutch.

One hundred and twenty-three friends ask prayer for the healing of other relatives and friends. Twenty-four friends ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or other friends. Fifty-six friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs, including one that a way may be opened to provide means for self and mother. Fifty-four friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including one for the return of husband and that peace and harmony may come to their home, another that she may be released from prison.

Beautiful Patriotic Silver Spoons

One for Every State in the Union

The Christian Herald has made arrangements with one of the largest silverware manufacturing concerns in the country for the distribution of silver spoons, one for each of the forty-eight States.

Women all over the country are collecting these State spoons. 90,000 silver spoons have been sold in Philadelphia alone. A Chicago paper disposed of 104,000 spoons of various kinds. A syndicate of papers covering six States has disposed of one million spoons. But these spoons should not be compared with those the Christian Herald is now offering.

Every spoon has on it the name and the seal of the State it represents, and each one has written around it the special guarantee from the manufacturer, agreeing to replace free of charge any spoon which does not give satisfactory service to the purchaser.

You May Secure a Set Free

and in addition you may secure, without cost, a beautiful sugar spoon representing the Capitol of the nation, with the name "Washington" and a bas-relief of the Father of his country upon it.

Many people are securing sets as gifts to friends or relatives, for such occasions as Weddings, Anniversaries, etc. They are the heaviest kind of silver plate and will be an ornament to any dinner table.

The Uncle Sam Sugar Spoon, which is given Free in connection with the sets of teaspoons, is a real triumph of the silversmith's art. A plain drawing of it is shown here, but it must be seen to be appreciated. The bowl is large, smooth, and free from ornamentation. This makes it easy to clean.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD receives from the various publishing houses many books for examination and review. It is possible to find space for a review of the books sent, and furthermore of the books do not meet with the approval of the editors of our paper. We wish our readers to feel that where a book is mentioned in the pages of the Christian Herald it is the result of a thoughtful perusal. Often a book which seems helpful and interesting is laid aside to await the time for a more thorough examination to be given it, and an extended review recorded. In this way it not infrequently happens that considerable time is consumed before the receipt of the book for publication of the review. As a result of this we have thus been awaiting the publication of the review of the book which we are glad to recommend at this time:

"Harmony" Life of Jesus †
A beautiful book has been issued by the Northwestern Publishing Co. at Milwaukee. It bears the title, "Jesus, His Words and His Life," and is the work of the Rev.
J. H. Ballmann, D.D. It presents the life of Jesus in a new and interesting form the narrative of the life of Jesus, resultant from a comparison of the four Gospels. Because of the photographic illustrations, half-tone reproductions of paintings in which the book contains a score of very fine color-plates, also reproductions of well-known paintings. The text of the American Revision is followed, and the notes and explanations by Dr. Dallmann are woven into the Scripture paragraphs in a skilful manner, which does not interrupt the continuity and interest of the narrative. There are throughout the book copious quotations from literature, particularly the best hymnology, and much interesting data of contemporary history and geography. The work will be cherished in many homes, where it will be enjoyable and helpful to young and old alike.

A Large Variety

The Saloon Fight at Berne, Indiana, written by Fred Rohrer and published by the Berne Witness Company, tells in vigorous language the thrilling story of the author's campaign against the saloon in that city. Its own title page well describes the book: "Not a novel, but real history, truth stranger than fiction." How a brave man went through with his work in the face of threats and persecution and dangers, and how he won out in the end, make the book interesting to all lovers of courage as well as to all lovers of temperance.

The Autobiography of Arthur T. Pierson, by his son Delavan L. Pierson, published by Fleming H. Revell Company, not only outlines the life of this honored and useful evangelist and Bible teacher, but gives many interesting glimpses of other Christian workers of his era and various evangelistic and Bible study movements of the time. There are intimate glimpses of such men as Spurgeon and A. J. Gordon, and incidents of the founding and early work of the Northfield and Keswick assemblies. The book also reveals to us Dr. Pierson as a Bible student and describes his methods and plans of Bible study.

A dainty and skilfully compiled year-book is issued by the Abingdon Press, compiled by Margaret Bird Steinmetz. It is entitled Leaves of Life, and contains on each page the birth date of three or four famous men or women, a selection from the works of one or more of the writers born on that day, together with other literary gems, a passage of Scripture and a prayer. The book has wide catholicity, bringing together the best of the ancients with the best of living writers. It is charmingly bound in green leather and is a delight to the eye and touch as well as to the soul.

A truly refreshing book is Hogan and Hogan, by Charles A. McAlpine, published by the DuBois Press, Rochester, N. Y. Mr. McAlpine rivals the famous Mr. Dooley in the mastery of the Irish dialect and philosophy. The book is made up of the sayings of one Hogan, who with his good wife, the other member of the firm of Hogan and Hogan, state their observations of the life and work of Protestant ministers, laymen and organizations. Their homilies are not only refreshingly humorous, but startlingly suggestive, pointing out many weak places in modern Protestant church life, and hinting the way to better things.

Deeper Experiences of Famous Christians, edited by G. Gilchrist Lawson, and issued by the Glad Tidings Publishing Company, Chicago, Ill. is a collection of narratives which relate the crises in the lives of a number of the world's great spiritual leaders in which they passed to a higher, purer and more powerful plane of Christian living. The book is a challenge to every Christian believer to seek the highest possible standards of Christian living, and the true stories of the successful search of these earnest souls for the life of purity and power will encourage many who are hungering for the "fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of peace."

The number of people who are interested in prayer and its possibilities grows greater rather than less. Two remarkable books have been issued, one a year or so ago, the other within a few months, both of which will be of very practical help to those who would learn more of the secrets of prayer. The earlier book is entitled Wireless Messages, Possibilities Through Prayer, and is written by C. M. Broadhurst, published by Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. It relates not only the triumphs of prayer recorded in the Bible but those of the intervening centuries down to the present times. The book is full to the brim of thrilling proofs of the willingness of God to give and help lavishly in answer to the prayer of faith. The more recent book, published by Geo. H. Doran, New York, is entitled Men Who Prayed. It is by Henry W. Frost, who is already well known as a helpful and inspiring teacher of the subject of prayer. Mr. Frost has been for twenty-five years connected with the administration of the China Inland Mission, and writes from a heart full of zeal for the cause of Christ. He calls his book Familiar Heart-to-Heart Talks Concerning the Lives of the Old Testament Saints Who Offered Prayer to Jehovah." In these pages his Old Testament heroes are made to live again. What they achieved through their prayer and faith is felt to be possible for us who live in these later and still better days.

INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE COUNSEL

This department is maintained for the benefit of our regular readers; the service is offered entirely free of cost to them, and all correspondence is strictly personal and confidential, in so far as the identity of the inquirer is concerned. Always enclose letter postage and write name and address plainly, addressing your inquiry to Financial Editor, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

Neither THE CHRISTIAN HERALD nor any other publication can guarantee the value of investment securities. We do all we can, however, to make sure of the integrity of our advertisers before admitting them to our columns. Any advice given is an expression of our conclusions, based upon information we believe to be reliable; but we must not be held responsible, should any loss arise from its acceptance.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

J. A. V., ILLINOIS. The Christian Herald has no means of knowing the value of land in southern Mississippi. The purchase of land is surrounded by a more than ordinary degree of hazard, and the hazard is immeasurably increased where the purchaser has no personal knowledge of the land he seeks to buy. Hence, we would say to our readers, never buy land you have not seen, that you have not personally examined carefully. During the past ten years many land companies have been organized and their tracts sold to the public. If all their customers had first looked into the proposition with their own eyes, and not merely accepted the representations made in a prospectus, there would have been much less money lost in this form of speculation.

REV. T. B. C., GEORGIA. Atchison common is one of the most attractive stocks on the list. We think you would be quite safe in buying ten shares for a permanent investment. Ten shares will cost approximately $960 and will yield about 6.30 per cent.

MISS D. P. M. Chino Copper Company controls the properties formerly owned by the Santa Rita Mining Company in New Mexico. Company paid initial quarterly dividend of 75 cents a share June 30, 1913. September 30, 1914, dividend was reduced to 50 cents. The par value of shares is $5, so you see at present price of $35 the investment yield is less than 6 per cent. This yield is too small for a mining investment.

"NOVICE," NEW YORK. The partial payment or installment plan applied to the purchase of good securities works splendidly, and the Christian Herald recommends it to its readers who desire to acquire ownership of securities, but who find it inconvenient to pay all down. But the investor should be careful in his selection of the firm to whom he gives his patronage. Both firms you refer to are well rated, and are members of the New York Stock Exchange.

E. E. C., OHIO. The Beaver Company, Canton, Ohio, and Buffalo, N. Y., manufactures the most widely advertised and most generally used plaster wall-board in the United States. For the last four years the company has earned more than five times the amount necessary to pay preferred dividends. The stock is selling at $106, netting 6.60 at this price. A good speculative investment for a business man.

MRS. H. W. G., PENNSYLVANIA. The International Textbook Company has maintained a long and consistent dividend record, but no one can tell how much longer the company will continue its past successes. Judging by its past records, however, the stock might be considered an attractive speculative investment for a limited amount, but we call attention to the fact that the company has been asking $125 a share for the stock, when it is quoted by curb brokers in the eighties or nineties.

C. O. S., NEW YORK. (1) Marquette, Houghton & Ontonagon R. R. is controlled by the Duluth, South Shore & Atlantic Railway. The general six per cent. bonds are very inactive, but are gilt-edged. (2) Southern Railway's earnings are a bit improved. Do not sell either the preferred or the common. You may get better prices by waiting.

MRS. T. M. C., FLORIDA. Invest your $2,500 as follows: One $500 Swift & Co. 5 per cent. gold bond at $480; one $1,000 Lackawanna Steel Company 6 per cent. two-year gold note at $980; one $1,000 Jackson (Miss.) Light & Traction Company first mortgage sinking fund 5 per cent. gold bond at $960, and one $100 Central Vermont R. R. Co. first mortgage 4 per cent. bond at $75. This arranges for an expenditure with interest of approximately $2,500.

MISS M. K., WISCONSIN. You state that your parents are considering the sale of their farm, and will have $10,000 to invest in securities. There are scores of sound investments on the market today at prices offering income yields of from five to six per cent. Indeed, there are so many securities we hardly know which ones to suggest. In the first place the one most important consideration is safety. That overshadows all other considerations. Next important should be income yield, and the next, marketability. Also do not put all your eggs into one basket—do not have all your money invested in any one class of security. $10,000 should be invested as follows:

$3,000, good 5 per cent. utility bonds
$3,000, first mortgage railroad bonds
$1,000, municipal bonds of eastern cities
$2,000, standard railroad stock.
$1,000, short term 5 or 6 per cent. notes.

By having your money thus invested you can obtain an average income yield of 5½ per cent.

D. T., MICHIGAN. (1) The three-year 5 per cent. gold bond of the City of Montreal, Canada, is an exceedingly attractive municipal investment for $1,000. (2) Japanese bonds at $750 are not in the same class. While the war is on avoid bonds of belligerent nations. (3) At present American Locomotive 7 per cent. preferred dividend is uncertain. The last annual report showed a surplus of over $11,000,000 and cost of more than $7,300,000, so the company can easily pay the dividend and charge it to surplus.

MRS. L. A. L., CALIFORNIA. The Postal Life is a legal reserve, old line life insurance company, licensed to do business by the state of New York, whose laws governing life insurance companies are very strict. The company in no way differs from any other big life company in its method of writing insurance except that it employs no agents and solicits business entirely through the mails, thus effecting economies which permit the company offering lower premium rates than other companies which still adhere solely to the agency system. The company's nearest physician, in Los Angeles, will make the examination.

REV. T. W. H., KANSAS. You may be able to obtain the required loan on your church property from the Mercantile Trust Company, St. Louis, Mo. This bank does an extensive loan business on church properties, and charges the lowest market rates of interest.

W. B. C., OHIO. The Jamestown Portland Cement Corporation was incorporated in 1909. The properties are located on deep tidewater at Yorktown, Va. The company controls marl lands along the York River in Virginia, with deposits averaging between 20 and 40 feet in thickness, in blanket formation. There is an issue of $2,000,000 of seven per cent. cumulative preferred stock with a par value of $100.

DR. W. E. C., INDIANA. The only elevated railway security yielding 6 per cent. or more is the Chicago Elevated Railways two-year 5 per cent. secured gold notes (a closed issue) now selling at 97 and interest, to yield 6.07 per cent. These notes mature July 1, 1916.

MRS. D., CONNECTICUT. Have no fear for the safety of your Atlantic Coast Line Railroad 4s. These bonds are secured by direct closed mortgage on nearly 4,000 miles of road, being a first mortgage on over 1,000 miles and a general lien, subject to $29,730,500 and underlying bonds on the balance. Rather than sell you had better invest the surplus $3,000 in these bonds while the price is around 92.

F. E. W., KENTUCKY. For a young insurance company the Chio National Life has done exceedingly well. The fifth annual statement, December 31, 1914, reveals a healthy financial condition.

MISS "PRUDENCE." We approve of your choice of one Middle West Utilities ten-year 6 per cent. collateral gold bond at $950 to yield 6½ per cent. and ten shares of Baltimore & Ohio 4 per cent. preferred $680 to yield 6 per cent.

M. D. W., VERMONT. Buy one Government of Switzerland five per cent. gold note. These notes may be obtained through any of the banking houses whose advertisements appear in this issue.

A. P. (1) We do not advise on matters of grain speculation. (2) The following might be considered for your diversified investment of $9,000, if you desire exclusively public service funds: Michigan Railway Company first lien 6 per cent. five-year gold notes; Rockford & Interurban Railway Company first mortgage 5 per cent. gold bonds; Jackson Gas Company first mortgage 5 per cent. bonds; Michigan Light Company, Bay City Gas Company, first mortgage 5 per cent. bonds; Rockford, Beloit & Janesville Railroad Company first mortgage 5 per cent. gold bonds; Commonwealth Power Railway and Light Company 6 per cent. cumulative preferred stock; Central Illinois Light Company first and refunding mortgage 30-year 5 per cent. gold bonds; Consumers' Power Company 6 per cent. cumulative preferred stock; Commonwealth Power Railway and Light Company, five-year 6 per cent. convertible gold bonds.

she did not like to be with Jamie, not to talk with him—but that not mean that she was not often with him. She was with him, indeed, more often than before, for so restless as she, and so fearful was that she would detect her unhappy friend, that she lost no opportunity of responding to his overtures of friendship; and sometimes she merely sought him out. This last did it often have to do, however, more and more frequently these days seemed to be turning to her companionship.

The reason for this, Pollyanna believed, was to be found in the same old old story of the bull and the rescue. That Jamie ever referred to it did not even gayer than usual; Pollyanna thought she detected time a bitterness underneath it that as never there before. Certainly could not help seeing that these seemed almost to want to do, and that he actually did, with relief, when he found himself alone with her. She thought why this was so, after he had been, as he did one day, while we were watching the others play.

One day, after all, Pollyanna, there was no one who can quite understand you can."

"What?" Pollyanna had not noticed that he meant at first. They were watching the players for five minutes without a word between them. "Or you, once—couldn't walk?"

"Yes, I know," faltered Pollyanna as she knew that her great secret had been shown in her face, quickly and so blithely did he take the subject, after a laughing: "Come, Pollyanna, why don't you come to play the game? I'll be in your place. Forgive me, I was a brute to make you look like that!"

Pollyanna smiled, and said: "No, no, indeed!" But she did not go. She could not. And that made her the more anxious to be alone and help him all she could. "How I'd ever let him see that I was anything but glad when he came!" she thought fervently, and hurried forward a minute later to her turn in the game.

Pollyanna, however, was not the only one of the party who felt a new freedom and restraint. Jimmy also felt it, though he, too, tried to hide it.

It was not happy these days. A care-free youth, whose visions of wonderful spans across hither- and yonder chasms, he had come to realize as a young man whose life was of a feared rival bearing the girl he loved.

Jimmy knew very well now that he was with Pollyanna. He suspected that he had been in love with her some time. He stood aghast, and found himself so shaken and restless before this thing that had happened to him. He knew that even his bridges were as nothing when set against the smile in a girl's mouth, the word on a girl's lips. He knew that the most wonderful span in the world to him would be the one that could help him to cross the sea of fear and doubt that he felt between him and Pollyanna—doubt of Pollyanna; fear because of

To him they could mean but one thing: Jamie, too, loved Pollyanna, and Jamie had to stand by, helpless—"tied to two sticks." That was what he had said. Jimmy believed that, had he himself been obliged to stand by helplessly, "tied to two sticks," while another rescued the girl that he loved, he would have looked like that.

Jimmy had gone back to camp that day with his thoughts in a turmoil of fear and rebellion. He wondered if Pollyanna cared for Jamie; that was where the fear came in. But even if she did care, a little, must he stand aside weakly, and let Jamie, without a struggle, make her learn to care more? That was where the rebellion came in. Indeed, no; he would not do it, decided Jimmy. It should be a fair fight between them.

Then, all by himself as he was, Jimmy flushed hot to the roots of his hair. Would it be a "fair" fight? Could any fight between him and Jamie be a "fair" fight? Jimmy felt suddenly as he had felt years before when, as a lad, he had challenged a new boy to a fight for an apple they both claimed, then, at the first blow, had discovered that the new boy had a crippled arm. He had purposely lost then, of course, and had let the crippled boy win. But he told himself fiercely now that this case was different. It was no apple that was at stake. It was his life's happiness. It might even be Pollyanna's life's happiness, too. Perhaps she did not care for Jamie at all, but would care for her old friend Jimmy, if he but once showed her he wanted her to care. And he would show her. He would—

Once again Jimmy blushed hotly. But he frowned, too, angrily: if only he could forget how Jamie had looked when he had uttered that moaning "tied to two sticks!" If only—but what was the use? It was not a fair fight, and he knew it. He knew, too, right there and then, that his decision would be just what it afterwards proved to be: he would watch and wait. He would give Jamie his chance; and if Pollyanna showed that she cared, he would take himself off and away quite out of their lives; and they should never know, either of them, how bitterly he was suffering. He would go back to his bridges—as if any bridge, though it led to the moon itself, could compare for a moment with Pollyanna! But he would do it. He must do it.

It was all very fine and heroic, and Jimmy felt so exalted he was at a loss with something that was almost happiness when he finally dropped off to sleep that night. But martyrdom in theory and practice differs woefully, as would-be martyrs have found out from time immemorial. It was all very well to decide alone and in the dark that he would give Jamie his chance; but it was quite another matter really to do it when it involved nothing less than the leaving of Pollyanna and Jamie together almost every time he saw them. Then, too, he was very much worried at Pollyanna's apparent attitude toward the lame youth. It looked very much to Jimmy as if she did indeed care for him, so watchful was she of his comfort, so apparently eager to be with him. Then, as if to settle any possible doubt in Jimmy's mind, there came the day when Sadie Dean had something to say on the subject.

They were all out in the tennis court. Sadie was sitting alone when Jimmy strolled up to her.

"You next with Pollyanna, isn't it?" he queried.

She shook her head.

"Pollyanna isn't playing any more this morning."

"Isn't playing!" frowned Jimmy, who had been counting on his own game with Pollyanna. "Why not?"

For a brief minute Sadie Dean did not answer; then with very evident difficulty she said:

"Pollyanna told me last night that she thought we were playing tennis too much; that it wasn't kind to—Mr. Carew, as long as he can't play."

"I know; but—" Jimmy stopped helplessly, the frown plowing a deeper furrow into his forehead. The next instant he fairly started with surprise at the tense something in Sadie Dean's voice, as she said:

"But he doesn't want her to stop. He doesn't want any of us to make any difference—for him. It's that that hurts him so. She doesn't understand. She doesn't understand! But I do. She thinks she does, though!"

Something in words or manner sent a sudden pang to Jimmy's heart. He threw a sharp look into her face. A question flew to his lips. For a moment he held it back; then, trying to hide his earnestness with a bantering smile, he let it come.

"Why, Miss Dean, you don't mean to convey the idea—that there's any special interest in each other—between those two, do you?"

She gave him a scornful glance.

"Where have your eyes been? She worships him! I mean—they worship each other," she corrected hastily.

Jimmy, with an inarticulate ejaculation, turned and walked away abruptly. He could not trust himself to remain longer. He did not wish to talk any more, just then, to Sadie Dean. So abruptly, indeed, did he turn, that he did not notice that Sadie Dean, too, turned hurriedly, and busied herself looking in the grass at her feet, as if she had lost something. Very evidently, Sadie Dean, also, did not wish to talk any more just then.

Jimmy Pendleton told himself that it was not true at all; that it was all folderol, what Sadie Dean had said. Yet, nevertheless, true or not true, he could not forget it. It colored all his thoughts thereafter, and loomed before his eyes like a shadow whenever he saw Pollyanna and Jamie together. He watched their faces covertly. He listened to the tones of their voices. He came then, in time, to think it was, after all, true: that they did worship each other; and his heart, in consequence, grew like lead within him. True to his promise to himself, however, he turned resolutely away. The die was cast, he told himself. Pollyanna was not to be for him.

Restless days for Jimmy followed. To stay away from the Harrington homestead entirely he did not dare, lest his secret be suspected. To be with Pollyanna at all now was torture. Even to be with Sadie Dean was unpleasant, for he could not forget that it was Sadie Dean who had finally opened his eyes. Jamie, certainly, was no haven of refuge under the circumstances; and that left only Mrs.

Carew. Mrs. Carew, however, was a host in herself, and Jimmy found his only comfort these days in her society. Gay or grave, she always seemed to know how to fit his mood exactly; and it was wonderful how much she knew about bridges—the kind of bridges he was going to build. She was so wise, too, and so sympathetic, knowing always just the right word to say. He even one day almost told her about The Packet; but John Pendleton interrupted them just at the wrong moment, so the story was not told. John Pendleton was always interrupting, thought Jimmy, vexedly, sometimes. Then, when he remembered what John Pendleton had done for him, he was ashamed.

"The Packet" was a thing that dated back to Jimmy's boyhood, and had never been mentioned to anyone save to John Pendleton, and that only once, at the time of his adoption. The Packet was nothing but a large white envelope, worn with time, and plump with mystery, behind a huge red seal. It had been given him by his father, and it bore the following instructions in his father's hand:

"To my boy, Jimmy: Not to be opened until his thirtieth birthday, except in case of his death, when it shall be opened at once."

There were times when Jimmy speculated a good deal as to the contents of that envelope. There were other times when he forgot its existence. In the old days, at the Orphans' Home, his chief terror had been that it should be discovered and taken away from him. In those days he wore it always hidden in the lining of his coat. Of late it had been tucked away in the Pendleton safe.

"For there's no knowing how valuable it may be," John Pendleton had said, with a smile. And, anyway, your father evidently wanted you to have it, and we wouldn't want to run the risk of losing it."

"No, I wouldn't want to lose it, of course," Jimmy had smiled back, a little soberly. "But I'm not counting on its being real valuable, sir. Poor dad didn't have anything that was very valuable about him, as I remember."

It was this packet that Jimmy came so near mentioning to Mrs. Carew one day—if only John Pendleton had not interrupted them.

"Still, maybe it's just as well I didn't tell her about it," Jimmy reflected afterwards, on his way home. "She might have thought dad had something in his life that wasn't quite—right. And I wouldn't have wanted her to think that—of dad."

This Girl Could Walk or Stand—at the age of four Pink Vosburg, daughter of Mrs. L. C. McLain, of Bedford, Ia. Mrs. Vosburg brought her daughter to this Sanitarium in 1911, for treatment of Infantile Paralysis. The child could neither walk nor stand alone, but could only crawl on her hands and knees. She was here eight months; now walks, goes to school and gets about splendidly. Mrs. Vosburg will affirm the above.

This is not a selected case, nor are the results unusual.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

Conquering Discouragement

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topic for April 4. Ps. 27: 1-14
(Consecration meeting)

HOW to conquer discouragements? That is a very modern question, as well as a very ancient one. This twenty-seventh Psalm has some good suggestions. We may conquer discouragements,

(1) By thinking of God. Verse 1.
(2) By seeking his presence. Verses 4 and 8.

(3) By praising and singing. Verse 6. If Paul and Silas had yielded to their discouragements in the Philippian jail they might have been there yet. But though they were far from home and friends, though they were in prison, though their backs were sore from beating and their feet in the stocks, and though it was midnight, instead of complaining or sleeping they sang praises to God and deliverance came.

(4) By praying. Verses 9, 11, 12.
(5) By trusting. Verses 10 and 13.
(6) By waiting. Verse 14.

Then the second and third verses come true, and our enemies, whether they are men or circumstances, stumble and fall. Read Isa. 40: 28-31.

Easter, the Promise of Immortality

Epworth League Topic for April 4.
John 11: 25; Phil. 3: 20, 21; II Tim. 1: 10

MANY true and beautiful things have been said about Jesus, both inside and outside the Scriptures. But of all these beautiful things said and written, few are more beautiful than these words from Paul's letter to Timothy in which he says of Christ that he "brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel."

That was for centuries the one dark spot in the thought life of mankind. "What can we do about death?" "What comes hereafter?" "Can there be such a thing as immortality?" Life was a fact, immortality was a fact, but they were shrouded in darkness. Jesus brought them to light. He showed people how to find them.

He shows us that God is love; he shows us a way to get rid of sin; he takes away the terror of death; he helps us to bear the agony of separation from our loved ones; he tells us about the "many mansions" where they dwell with him; he promises to lead us to the tearless land if we will but follow him.

This solid gold-shell initial ring given to you

Wonderful introductory offer—closes April 30, 1915. Send the coupon below today with a signature from a one-pound package of Arbuckles' Ariosa or Arbuckles' Ground Coffee, and 10 cents in stamps or coin.

Questions and Answers

F. G. M., Corvallis, Ore. Is it not an error to hold forth that this is a Protestant nation? True, it is not a Roman Catholic nation. But is it not true that it is neither a Protestant nation nor a Roman Catholic nation, but a free nation, under our national and state constitutions? Is it not true that a large majority of our people are not professors of religion, belong to no church, and, hence, would be more likely to try to hold this as a free country rather than as a Protestant or a Catholic country? While I am a member of a Protestant church, it seems to me, and I think to others, that the line indicated in the foregoing questions is the proper one and the more likely to succeed in the struggle to make this nation denominational. We believe the majority of our people want this nation to be and to remain a free nation, untrammelled by union of state and church or by undue denominational interference or influence.

If the religious population is dealt with exclusively and majorities are taken into account, the nation might be regarded as overwhelmingly Protestant. Of a total membership of 38,708,000 in all the religious bodies (as Dr. Carroll's recent official Federal Council report showed) 13,813,000 are Catholics as against 24,895,000 of all other organizations, mainly Protestant. Indeed, the six leading Protestant bodies—Baptist, Methodist, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Episcopal and Disciples—alone have 24,895,000 members and adherents, or nearly double the Catholic figures. Besides, as Dr. Carroll's report showed, the Catholic Church includes with its communicants "the unconfirmed baptized; that is, children who have not been admitted to their first communion." On the other hand, if we take into account the whole population of 100,000,000, the enrolled religionists of all creeds being less than one-half, we would not be justified in claiming the nation as Protestant. There is no desire on the part of Protestants, so far as we know, to make such a claim, and they have very properly resented the widely proclaimed purpose of the Roman Church to "make America Catholic." Under our constitution, which guarantees freedom of religion for all, such a claim is preposterous.

G. H., Grayville, Ill. Please state why time before 1752 is called "O. S." (or Old Style) and since that time "N. S.," and by whom was the change made and why? An explanation will help a number of us.

One of the Popes (Gregory XIII), with the view of rectifying the then current calendar, devised a new one in which ten days were omitted, October 5, 1582, becoming October 15. The "New Style" was adopted by France, Italy, Spain, Denmark, Holland, Belgium and Portugal in 1582, by Germany and Switzerland in 1584, Hungary 1587, Britain 1752. After 1700 an additional day was dropped, making eleven days' difference between "Old Style" and "New Style," and again after 1800 an additional day was dropped, since which the "New Style" has remained fixed. In Russia, Greece and the East, the "Old Style" has been retained, although even in these countries it is being gradually superseded.

F. L. S., Michigan. For six years there has been ill feeling between a member of our family and myself on account of some plain facts which I told her, and which I knew to be true. She will not write to me, and I do not feel quite satisfied with myself. I wrote her once, making no retractions nor asking any, but it did no good. I don't feel exactly sorry for what I wrote, though I wish it had not been written. But the provocation was very strong, and at the time I could see no wrong in writing as I did. But now in the light of recent religious experience, I do not feel easy. Please advise me.

We have quoted at length from your letter because the circumstances it describes could be duplicated in countless cases. Of all the causes which are clouding Christian experiences and blocking spiritual power, this single cause of cherishing resentment is probably the chief. It will help you to find the answer to your own problem to look at your letter frankly as it lies before you now in type. If some one else had written it wouldn't you suspect that there was very little love in it? Wouldn't it be a little hard to find humility in it? Is it strange, then, that there is not perfect peace in the writer's heart? Such incidents or one such incident will mar the peace of any life. Your duty is very clear. Write at once to this friend—we have purposely concealed the relationship, because it is one which should be almost the tenderest of all—saying how you grieve for her love and how much you regret the heart separation. Say that while you cannot take back the accusations because they are true, you are sorry you spoke without love. If the wrong was against yourself, say that you freely and fully forgive it. Then ask her to forgive you for having allowed the separation to broaden and deepen, and plead that she join with you in seeking the way back to heart unity. The love that "seeks not its own" will win back your lost companion. Read the thirteenth chapter of I Corinthians upon your knees; then write your letter. Care most of all that you shall both be true to God, that he shall be pleased with each of your lives. Then as you write, in the atmosphere of self-definitely stated that these sufferings were to be inflicted by the Jews. We shall be glad to have our readers call our attention to any such passages if we have overlooked them. God never plans that any one do wrong, but he often leads his servants up into positions in which he knows they must inevitably meet suffering and disaster inflicted by his enemies. The church will probably never again slip back to a discussion of that old difficulty of reconciling the freedom of the will to the fact of God's foreknowledge. We know that the whole universe of soul is founded on the principle that character is dependent upon choice. Tests are constantly being presented, and character is achieved by choosing the right and rejecting the evil. God knew that, sin being what it was, his Son would be slain when he came to earth with his heavenly message. 3. We can only state again that it was inevitable, the world being what it was and Jesus being what he was, that he should be

WHILE IT IS YET DARK

BY ALICE J. WHITTIER

*Oh, but to touch thee! Up through darkness groping!
The night lies close, and all the morning's shoving Seems far and faint in this night's hour of rain.
I am afraid, and so alone, my Father!
Oh, tell me that the light will come again.
(Sweet harp of silence to the Still Voice thrilling)
"Know I have never ceased to hold thy hand.
Forevermore the light hath scattered darkness,
And soon the morning comes to bless the land."*

*But in my heart a deeper night is lying,
And all the earth is full of pain and crying,
For he thou lovest hath been ta'en away.
Why should earth's noblest sons be swept to battle,
And goodly flesh be mangled into clay?
I sleep and see the sodden trenches filling
With dead, white things but now were quick and strong.
I wake to hear the widows and the orphans Calling, "How long? O thou our God, how long?"*

*How can thy children, though the cannon rattle;
Though blood-stench drunken, and the heat of battle
Strike into flame all pride of race and state,
Spill brother's blood and break the heart of woman?
Kill and destroy in bitterness and hate?
"Death is sin's certain wages, O my daughter,
Hate's bitter fruit of jealousy and sin.
But lift thine eyes and see beyond the slaughter
The great world-peace is being ushered in."*

*"Long have I waited to give joy for sorrow;
Now will they hearken. On a brighter morrow
They who are mine shall hear and understand.
Lift up thine head and reach the hands of helping;
Know thy redemption's even now at hand.
Wait thou in faith the morning sun's uprising:
Work thou in faith, and Love shall keep his own;
Watch thou in faith; for faith's divine surprising Easter dawn lingers till man's faith be grown."*

forgetfulness and prayer and love, he will show you how to lead her heart into the way of truth and love and peace.

H. M. A., Dover, Pa. 1. According to the estimates of Bible chronologists, Cain was born about 4170 B.C.; the murder of Abel is placed about 4043 B.C. Then followed the flight into exile. There is nothing in Scripture to warrant the statement that Cain was one hundred and twenty-eight years old when he was married. 2. The passage in Gen. 6:6 is intended to show that God, who had been merciful and long-suffering towards an impious race, was now about to show himself a God of judgment. The language chosen—that God "repented," etc.—was doubtless meant to translate the idea into terms suited to human understanding and experience, although God cannot change (Mal. 3: 6; James 1: 17). 3. There is no real conflict in the two genealogies of Jesus, as recorded in the Gospel. Luke traces the descent through David's son, Nathan, while Matthew traces it through Solomon.

J. H. R. 1. Was it in God's plan that the Jews, God's own people, were to crucify Christ? 2. If so why should they be blamed? 3. If the Jews had not crucified him how would atonement have been made?

1 and 2. We do not recall that in any of the passages fortelling the sufferings of Christ it is slain. It is idle to speculate the various ways in which that death might have occurred. It has often been pointed out by physicians that the flow of water from the heart of Jesus indicates that it had literally burst with its weight of grief. He might have died in Gethsemane, under the great weight of anguish there. This anguish was caused by the world's sin. It was the world's sin that killed him. "Sin when it is finished bringeth forth death." He put himself in front of the arrows of sin; he put himself in the path of death.

L. V. W., Mount Kisco, N. Y. Why is the constellation the Southern Cross in the southern hemisphere so widely noted?

Professor S. P. Leland, the well-known astronomer, gives this reply to the foregoing: "The main special interest in the Southern Cross is the fact that the constellation of the Centaur contains the nearest star to us of the first magnitude, and that the feet of the Centaur touch the Southern Cross. This Cross is formed of four stars of the second magnitude. It reigns like a queen in splendor and silence over the measureless solitudes of the South Pole."

H. H. Savage, pastor First Baptist Church, Barron, Wis., writes: "I was interested in your answer to Mrs. A. C. G. in the March issue of the Christian Herald on the question referring to certain so-called 'magic' books. At one time in my life I became very much interested in Spiritualism. These peculiar trivances are looked upon as being harmless by a great many people; but the fact of the matter is that it is the devil's own tool for leading people into the heresy which God continually warned his people against getting into—the awful tentacle grasp of the heresy of spiritualism. Your answers are usually so clear, concise, definite, and truly helpful that I take the liberty to speak to you on this point now as I do that ignorance of the truth pertaining to these things has led many at unsuspecting one into error."

Reader, Ravenna, Ohio. The past you mention probably belongs to the "destructive" school of higher critics, who have little hesitation in attacking the Bible. Their puny attacks make no impression upon what Gladstone called "the impregnable rock of Holy Scripture." It is quite natural that they should antagonize evangelists who preach "a whole Gospel of full salvation," as Billy Sunday does. They seem to forget that "if this thing is of God, it will stand," despite all opposition, whereas if it be not of God, it cannot endure.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

THE CHINA THAT SHALL BE

ITS a good Easter thought that China will become a Christian nation. It is a wonderful prospect. It is, moreover, a perfectly reasonable prophecy. A prophecy in keeping with the Scriptures and in keeping with the signs of the time in that vast land. And among all the forces that combine to bring this to pass it seems safe to say, none more potent than the charity bestowed upon the very east of China's people, her orphans.

If all this is true, if China is to become Christian and largely through the instrumentality of those who today are dependent children, what more fitting subject could be presented in these opening pages of the Easter number of the Christian Herald than that of the progress of the Chinese orphanage who are supported by the bounty of the Christian Herald Family? Already their dull and hopeless lives have been filled with the light of the risen Lord; to them Easter means more than anything else they know; for them Easter has become the story which they must tell their fellows—their countless fellow beings—whenever the time of preparation is completed and they are sent out into life to become just so many witnesses to the Gospel's power to bless them.

The process by which an entirely worthless skinned Chinese baby is changed into a valuable member of the great Oriental Republic can scarcely be told in a page or two. But enough may be possible in the space available to convey a fairly satisfactory impression of what takes place.

Orphans actual or by desertion—girls especially—are almost indigenous to China. The difficulty is not in finding them, but in avoiding them, for they are in excess of the means to care for them. But occasion offers now and then, and at once the missionary at hand remembers the child that had to be turned away with sorrow some time before. In all probability the child cannot now be found. But some score of others are known, and one is quickly brought within the protecting influence of the mission. So the capacity of the missions is always very near to the breaking point.

Received into the mission, or the orphanage, the wailing child who a day before was cast out of the protection of his own kin because he was one too many, or she wailing because the case might be, is painstakingly cleansed, unclothed and assigned to the place in the new family that his or her years dictate. From that point the scrap of flesh is treated as if there were an immortal soul wrapped up in it to some day be delivered into the hands of its owner, much as the finder of a package will safeguard it until the loser can receive it back.

"WE have our primary school and kindergarten," writes the secretary of the Christian Herald Home at Foochow, "and this past summer made a small beginning in industrial work by teaching cabinet-making to a few of the older boys." (That school is but five years old. In older schools or homes cabinet-making and weaving and farming are routine things.) Many of the children are upwards of fourteen and fifteen years of age when received, but even so must, as a rule, become babes in point of education, and begin at the beginning to learn everything a Christian boy or girl ought to know. Remarkable to relate, these slant-eyed children take with avidity to lesson tasks which American boys and girls look upon as punishment for being young. A paragraph from a recent letter addressed "To the patrons and friends of the Christian Herald Fukien

STAFF OF WORKERS, CHRISTIAN HERALD FUKIEN INDUSTRIAL HOMES, CHINA

Industrial Homes" by the boys and girls there will give a fair idea of the curriculum:

"This last term we have had regular drill and singing lessons. We have no drawing teacher yet, but Mr. Lieu, who takes care of the boys who are learning gardening in the city, will teach us another year. Mrs. Long, our Manchu house-mother, teaches us Mandarin. Dear Pastor Lek comes rain or shine to teach us the Bible. We wish you could have been here to see the sports at Christmas; the tug of war, the candle and eggs, bag, three-legged horse and rope-skipping races." The industrial work is mentioned later in the same letter, which also tells what is done to build up the health of the ailing ones:

"A lot of us boys were always ailing and the doctor said we should have a change and the sea was the best place for us. So forty of us started out with Miss Hartwell and teacher Lieu on a big ferry boat. We ran into two typhoons, and so the trip of a day became a cruise of a week. What a grand time we had on the beach! The smallest went back to Foochow, but thirty of us still stay and are growing fat and strong while we study half a day, and watch goats, and learn masonry or carpentry helping build the cottages in which to have the school. The little boys are the shepherds and live near their flocks of goats."

And still another phase of the orphanage life is revealed in this paragraph from the letter:

"Perhaps you heard of the great meetings Foochow had when Mr. Eddy was here. We boys went whenever we could, and twenty-seven of us decided at that time to make a stand for Jesus Christ. Besides prayers and Sunday services at our different churches, and Sunday school and Junior Endeavor at the Homes, we have Morning Watch. Mr. Lek first teaches the older boys to lead the Bible study, then they come to our dormitories and teach those of us who are members. These things bind our hearts together and help us to be happy and contented, and we hope to be worthy of what one of our friends says of those who went to the Boys' School at Ingtau: 'The boys have made a reputation for themselves up here for their quiet, orderly attention to their own business, for their courtesy and good manners.'"

"Are you wondering," says the letter, "when you shall hear about us girls?" (Well, to tell the truth, we were.) "We are so few in proportion, only fifteen in all for the five years." (A proportion that does not hold good in all cases, by any means.) "Lately two of us have been attending a Government Girls' Industrial School through the help of one of our sustaining members. We are very happy in our school life, but when vacation comes we have no good homes to go to. Last summer many of us learned sewing. We not only helped make suits for the Homes brothers, but we also made our own dresses."

"We have eighty boys and ten girls studying all the day, forty-one boys and two girls who study half a day and work the other half, and twenty-six boys who work all day and study evenings, and thirteen boys and one girl who work all the time with no special teaching."

The significant thing about all this is that Christian influence, Christian teaching and training, color everything that is done for these orphan boys and girls: boys and girls at the start, but young men and young women when they bid the missions farewell at last.

Just why it seems possible that this kind of missionary work may be of the very first importance in the future evangelizing of China will perhaps be seen from the following letter, or extracts from a letter, written at about the same time as the one from which the above quotations are taken. This next letter is dated at Sian, Shensi, China, January 27, 1915. It reflects what is being accomplished at just one of the many mission stations where orphans are received for Christian care. The thousand orphans for whom the Christian Herald Family have made themselves responsible are but a portion of the great number now within the protection of Protestant missionaries in China.

Our correspondent at Sian writes in part as follows:

"WHEN I said farewell to my Christian Herald friends last June, I promised to write when we got back to our station. We have been back now a few months. We had a very pleasant journey from New York to Shanghai, China. We got out there just at the time Japan declared war on Germany. Of course, everybody was in great excitement, wondering what it would mean to China as a whole. But so far we are glad to be able to say it has not disturbed China very much.

"As we had been away from China about six years, we expected to see a good many changes, both in Shanghai and other places. Yet, as a whole, China remains very much like what it used to be. It takes time to move this vast nation!

"From Shanghai we had before us the long and lonely journey of about 2,000 miles to the Sian plain in Shensi province. This time it was more lonely than usual, as we had left our dear children behind us. The first 700 miles we traveled by steamer up the Yangtse River to Hankow. From there we had two roads to choose between: one, the old road up the Han River by native sailboat to Longchutsai, and thence by pack mules over high mountains. This way it used to take from two to three months of travel. The other way is by railway from Hankow to Mienchih in Honan province, and thence to Sian by freight cart. This is the quicker route, but the most dangerous, as Honan province is a stronghold for highway robbers. We selected the railway route, however, as we wanted to get up to our station as soon as possible.

"This was our first experience of railway traveling in China. Compared with the railways in America, it is far behind in both comfort and speed.

"Owing to the great transportation of soldiers who were sent to capture the robber chief, the 'White Wolf,' we had some difficulty in securing carts for our journey to Sian. And because of bad roads, we had a trying time on our overland journey, but we got into Sian, safe and sound. When we arrived it was very painful for us to see the remaining evidences of the destruction of the Manchu city during the time of the last revolution in China. We got a very hearty welcome from our fellow missionaries as well as the native Christians. We could not help contrasting this with the welcome we received when we, twenty-three years ago, for first came back. These meetings lasted for days. Great crowds of people came to every meeting, although we held four a day. The power of the Holy Spirit was manifested in these gatherings. We had the joy of receiving twenty-two new members into the church by baptism. Afterward we visited nearly all our stations and held meetings at every place.

"At one station, Pingliang in Kansuh province, we spent a whole month. On Christmas we had an early service. We met at 5 A.M. and the chapel was crowded. Some of the people had come a long distance in the early morning. In the afternoon we had an entertainment for the Sunday school children at which the latter had a program to present and I am sure they did it in a way that it would have been a credit to any school in America.

"Rev. and Mrs. T. Wall are in charge of the work in Pingliang. At the place the readers of the Christian Herald supported a number of orphans from the beginning of our connection with that work. It was a great pleasure when we came back to learn that nearly all of the boys had decided to serve the Lord. Out of fifty orphans ten are good Christians, and out of the seven are engaged in evangelistic work. I enclose some photographs of these boys. I am sure it would be a matter of great gratification to those who helped to support these orphans to see their happy faces. It is not merely a case of keeping a few children from starvation, but it is the bringing up of good and useful men for the country and, better still, of faithful servants of God."

the first time visited Sian city. The people then did all they could to hinder us and even tried to get rid of us by violence. Now there is a remarkable willingness amongst the people to listen to the Gospel. Crowds gathered at our services, and our chapels are well filled at most of our meetings. We had special meetings here in Sian when we

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

DURING the past week official statements in France and Great Britain have given us data which enable us to compute with reasonable accuracy what the cost of the war to these two powers will be for the first year.

Monsieur Ribot, the French minister of finance, announced in the French Chamber of Deputies that at these rates France's total war expenditure to the end of March would be about 9,400,000,000 francs, or roughly, $1,800,000,000, a daily expenditure of $7,000,000. Of this sum, 4,600,000,000 francs had been advanced by the Bank of France, and 3,862,000,000 had been advanced by the public on national bonds of various kinds; hence, the balance must have been provided either by the receipts of extraordinary taxation or by a floating indebtedness.

The French national debt before the war amounted in round figures to $6,500,000,000; the departmental debt to $200,000,000 and the commercial debt to $890,000,000; a total of $7,600,000,000, and to this sum, since the beginning of the war to the present time, the fresh indebtedness of the nation alone will add $1,680,000,000.

During the week, also, the chancellor of the British exchequer, Mr. Lloyd-George, stated to Parliament that Great Britain's war expenses to the first of August would exceed $3,500,000,000, which is about a billion more than Mr. Asquith's original estimate. This means a daily expenditure of $9,850,000.

We are without accurate figures of the Russian expenditure, and Belgium's and Serbia's; but it is safe to say that the total outlay by the Triple Entente and their allies is not far from $30,000,000 a day, and of Germany and Austria combined about $25,000,000, sums so vast that in less than three weeks this bill will amount to a sum larger than the entire interest-bearing debt of the United States.

Statisticians of the French Government have also issued a summary of the results of the German invasion of France, from an economic and commercial point of view, and find that the war has placed over 50 per cent. of manufacturing industries of France temporarily in the hands of the Germans. Forty-three per cent. of France's steam power is in the districts occupied. The highest percentage is in the textile industries, where nearly 69 per cent. of the power is now in German hands. The mining industries, including quarries, follow, with 60.5 per cent, and the iron and metal industries are not far behind with 54 per cent.

The British Government is to take over the control of all factories in England producing war material. This announcement was made during the last week by the government, after several conferences between the Committee of Imperial Defense, representatives of the various industries affected, and the labor leaders. This arrangement is temporary, but it would be a great blessing to humanity if this condition could be permanent, not only in Great Britain, but in all the countries of the world. As a practical measure, easily and quickly realizable, it would be a most powerful instrument for averting rash and hasty wars, besides removing from private hands what really ought to be a government function.

The submarines have been active during the past week and their radius of work seems to have increased. One British ship was torpedoed off the extreme southern point of England, directly in the path of Atlantic commerce. In all, fifteen merchantmen were sunk, the loss of life being quite small.

The combat in the Dardanelles continued fiercely in the early part of last week, and slackened considerably during the latter part of the week. This slackening was caused, we are informed from Athens, by the great difficulties encountered by the allied fleet as they neared the so-called Narrows. Several mine-sweepers and a French submarine were sunk here, and as this is the most heavily mined as well as the most heavily fortified portion of the Dardanelles, it is imperative that these mines be removed before further serious efforts to force a passage can be made by the fleet. During the slackening of the bombardment the Turks managed, it is said, to strengthen their forts and construct emplacements for new batteries. They have also brought up a number of movable batteries on motor trucks and railway carriages, which are shifted from place to place.

An army, it is claimed by London, of 250,000 men has been concentrated in aid of the defense put up at the forts. In the latter part of last week and the early part of this, landing parties from the ships were very roughly handled and driven back.

As I write these lines, the latest London cables advise us that the naval expert of the London Times, a man well known in naval circles, states that the fleet will be unable to force a passage without the co-operation of

CONSTANTINE I, KING OF GREECE, WHERE WAR SPIRIT IS RISING

and forces, which, if well founded, the sending forward of an Anglo-French force of not less than 10,000 men, in view of the large Turkish force at hand. The French battleship Ocean and the Irresistible have been sunk in the fighting, and the Gaulois and Inflexible are reported out of action. These ships will of course be replaced. The English cruiser Amethyst was severely damaged, with a heavy loss in lives, while engaged in a gallant dash to cut the cable.

The bombardment of Smyrna, which began about ten days ago, was halted and then resumed, has made no progress, and most probably the purpose to reduce the town will be abandoned.

Little news reaches us as to the progress of the Russo-Turkish campaign in the Transcaucasus of a reliable nature, both sides claiming victory after victory, but little actually seems to have happened. Near the Persian Gulf the Turks claim to have driven the British out of Korma at the mouth of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers. We have as yet no British opinion on the subject.

As to the intentions of Italy, Bulgaria and Rumania, nothing dependable has reached us. From Italy come reports of the expulsion of Germans from the Italian Riviera, the severance, to a degree, of relations with Austria, concentration of Italian troops at the French frontier, anger of certain sections of the Italian people at Great Britain for her practical blockade of Italian ports, etc., etc., from all of which it is very difficult to draw any final conclusion.

According to reports from Bulgaria, attention is moving troops and artillery to their northern, eastern, southern and western borders simultaneously, apparently preparing for any possible emergency.

The fighting in Galicia and Bukovina during the last week has been comparatively light, which is not at all surprising under the circumstances. The thermometer is ranging between thirty and thirty degrees below zero, the snow on the level is three feet deep, and in places where exposed to the icy winds has drifted to a depth of twenty feet. Under these conditions the movement of artillery and supplies has become an impossibility and the changing positions by the troops entails suffering.

In some of the few skirmishes that have taken place, the men are reported to have fought in snow up to the shoulders. As a result, the changes in their train have been very slight. The Russians report that they have captured the outer forts of the Austrian fortress of Przemyśl, which has now resisted their attacks for over five months, and that the fall of that fortress is near at hand. There has been some little fighting along the lower reaches of the San River, with no important results. In eastern Galicia there has been some skirmishing near Janina, but this also was without importance. On the northern border of Bukovina, the Russians made a demonstration in force which degenerated into a resultless artillery duel.

Great complaint is again being made by Austria and Germany at the treatment of their prisoners by the Russians and efforts are again being made to induce that power to permit the inspection of her prison camps by representatives of the neutral powers. Up to the present, however, Russia has not given her consent to such inspection, and thus stands alone of the supposedly civilized powers in this matter.

News reached us during the week of the sinking of the French steamer La Touche by the German auxiliary cruiser Kronprinz Wilhelm off the coast of South America. The Kronprinz is possibly the only German war vessel on the open ocean, as circumstantial accounts have come from several sources lately, asserting that the Karlsruhe, the only other German warship free, was sunk either by design or accident—the accounts differ—a couple of months ago in the West Indies.

The light cruiser Dresden, which took flight and escaped at the time of the battle of the Falkland Islands, was caught up Sunday morning, March 14, by the two British cruisers, the Kent and Glasgow, and the auxiliary cruiser Orama, near the island of Juan Ferlessens the possibility of a Russian arrangement with Germany, unless Russian public opinion as regards England's part in the war grows much stronger. The Russians, like the French, do not understand the vast importance to the Allies of the work accomplished by the British fleet; like most continental people, their eyes are the mayors in the department, and invites them to use their best efforts to stop the propaganda. Every commune in France, town or township we would call it, has its mayor, and not the cities only as here. There are some 36,000 of these mayors in all.

In Poland, not only has there not been much fighting in the week just past, but the accounts of the situation which reach us are contradictory and confused. The siege of Ossowetz continues, but we have had absolutely no details of its progress. At the end of the week in North Poland, as far as one can ascertain by a comparison of the contradictory terms, the present battle-line begins at Tauroggen in the north near the frontier, and thence runs south through Szaki, Pilwiski, Mariampol, Krasnopol to a point directly east of Augustowo, thence to Ossowetz, to Mecarozo, thence along to Bobr River, north of Louiza, and south of Kolno and Myszemec to a point directly north of Przasnysz and thence through Stupsk and Zuromnick to a point on the Vistula River well to the east of Plock. South of the Vistula the line runs along the Rawka and Bzura Rivers to the Pilica, where it joins the Austrian line running south through Kielce to Tarnow.

The victories and defeats during the last week seem to about balance each other and to have entailed little change of importance. On the extreme north of East Prussia, Cossack cavalry and other troops succeeded in getting around the northern end of the German line, and penetrated into East Prussian territory, where, according to the Germans, they are burning and pillaging. By way of reprisal, the Germans have threatened if this burning and pillaging continues to burn the government buildings in the various provincial capitals of Russia and Poland which are in their possession.

Several aircraft attacks have taken place during the week in south Germany and at Calais, but none of them appear to have accomplished anything of moment.

On the western battle line the fighting at Neuve Chapelle and St. Eloi last week and the early part of this was a battle of great size and importance, and the losses to both sides have been tremendous. The British gained at these points about two miles forward on a front of five miles. The combat was fierce beyond description. The British massed 350 guns on the five-mile front and after several hours of bombardment the infantry advanced and the most desperate hand-to-hand fighting succeeded. Finally, the Germans gave ground for the distance mentioned. The German loss the British put at about 20,000, of whom some 1,700 were taken prisoners. The British loss was put at about 10,000.

Lord Claude Hamilton, addressing a meeting in London, said that the papers were not giving full lists of the losses. His own regiment, the Grenadier Guards, he declared lost their colonel and 16 officers, killed and wounded, and of 1,100 men, the finest in the army, only 300 survived. The Cameronians also seemed to have been almost totally wiped out. The system of concealment on the part of the military authorities, Lord Hamilton asserted, was most ridiculous, and he was afraid it would have the effect of prolonging the war.

Owing to the anxiety felt in Scotland regarding the Sixth Battalion of Gordon Highlanders, John E. Sutherland, member of Parliament, made inquiries of the government, whereupon the under secretary of the War Department replied that he greatly regretted to state that Colonel MacLean and four other officers had been killed and several wounded.

A despatch to the Times gives a list of 25 British officers killed, whose names had not appeared in the official lists, making a total of 338 officers killed or wounded in the recent fighting.

As regard the fighting in Champagne around Perthes, Le Mesnil and Beausejour, which names for the last month or so have figured nearly every

HOW GOD SAVES A SOUL

AN EVANGELISTIC SERMON FOR EASTER WEEK BY REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.*

"I am not ashamed of the Gospel, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." Rom. 1: 16, 17, R.V.

IN THESE stirring and troublous times there is a strong temptation to the preacher to preach about the times. But I strive to resist it for two or three reasons. In the first place I feel that the average occupant of the pew is about as intelligent on the times as the average preacher. In the second place, he hears as much about them during the week as is good for him. And in the third place, there is always some one in a congregation like this who is more or less under old-fashioned conviction of sin, and who is anxious before all else to learn the way of salvation.

Whenever I preach to a strange audience I still find myself under the spell of the story of Charles H. Spurgeon's conversion. I heard it at the beginning of my ministry and it has affected me as a preacher ever since. He was about sixteen when he was brought under deep conviction of sin and for six months wandered in spiritual darkness, fearing that God would never have mercy on him. Finally, he resolved to visit every place of worship in the town to find out the way of salvation, but he never heard it. The ministers preached truth, he said, great truths, truths that were fitting to many in their congregations, "but they never once told me how I might get my sins forgiven." At last, one snowy day, the storm compelled him to stop at an obscure street, and he turned down a court where there was a Primitive Methodist chapel. The services went on, but no minister came. At last a very thin-looking man came into the pulpit and opened his Bible and read these words: "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth." "Just setting his eyes upon me as if he knew me all by heart, he said, 'Young man, you are in trouble. You will never get out of it unless you look to Christ.' And then, lifting up his hands, he cried out, as only a Primitive Methodist could, 'Look! look! look!' 'It is only look,' said he. I saw at once the way of salvation, and oh, how I did leap for joy at that moment! I know not what else he said, I was so possessed with that one thought. I had been waiting to do fifty things, but when I heard this word, 'Look!' it settled everything."

The Gospel's Uplifting Power

Mr. Spurgeon used to say, influenced by his own experience, that a minister who can preach a sermon without addressing sinners does not know how to preach. Impressed by that thought I have chosen this text tonight. Paul is telling the Christians at Rome of his strong desire to visit that city and to preach Christ there, saying, "I am not ashamed of the Gospel." Every one knows that "Gospel" means "good news" or "glad tidings," that good news or glad tidings which Jesus Christ came into the world to proclaim, or rather which he himself was in his own person and work. But why is not Paul ashamed of it? Because "it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." It is the dynamic which God uses to lift men out of the death of sin into the life of righteousness. It is the great inclusive word of the Gospel, gathering into itself all the redemptive acts and processes. It implies deliverance from the guilt and power of sin, safety and preservation in God's grace, and healing and soundness of the soul and spirit. It is a great word surely.

"But, Paul, is this salvation for all men absolutely?" His answer is "Yes" and "No." It is for all in the sense that it is sufficient to save all, but it is for some, in the sense that it is efficient only "to every one that believeth."

Believe! Believe! Oh, how often we hear that word, and what, possibly, can it mean? How strange that men of intelligence and education should so often stumble at it! We know what it means in other cases, but in the things of the soul, how Satan blinds us to its apprehension! Men say, "We believe," or "We thought we had believed, but we have no consciousness of salvation. What does the word mean? What is it to believe?"

Let me help you to understand what it means by a synonym that has helped me. It is found in the second chapter of John's Gospel, where, speaking of Jesus as having wrought many miracles in a certain place and adding that many believed in him, he says: "But Jesus did not commit himself unto them, because he knew all men." We readily understand what "commit" means in such a case. It means that Jesus did not trust himself to these men, he did not give himself away to them, as we sometimes say. But that word "commit," so easy to be understood, is, in the original, the same as the word "believe," and it would not strain the language seriously to translate it thus: "Jesus did not believe himself unto them, because he knew all men."

If, then, to commit is to believe, to believe is to commit, and that man believes in Jesus Christ who commits himself to him, who trusts him, who gives himself away to him to be saved.

The Faith That Takes Hold

It is like this: Tonight you are on the ocean, let us say, and ere you turn into your berth, you observe a life-preserver fastened just above it. This is knowledge, but it is not faith. You go over to the wall to extinguish the light, and observe a printed notice attached to it, explaining that if the life-preserver be fastened around your body in a certain way it will keep you afloat in water. You assent to this, but assent is not faith. However, in the middle of the night a fog settles down upon the ocean, a collision occurs, a hole is stove into the side of the vessel, she fills and begins to sink. You jump out of your berth, fasten the life-preserver around you according to directions, ascend to the deck, and at the word of command plunge into the sea. That is faith. You are now acting on your knowledge, and turning your assent into trust; you are committing yourself to the life-preserver to be saved, and you are saved.

There are men and women in this congregation who have known about Jesus Christ from their youth up, but this is not faith. They yield assent to the fact that he is the Saviour of the world, and their Saviour if they believe, but this is not faith. Why not go a step further? Why not act on your knowledge, why not turn assent into trust? Why not definitely, in the silence of your hearts, just now say, "Lord Jesus, I here commit myself to thee to be saved"? You need not stand, you need not come forward, you need not raise a hand to do that, and yet in the doing of it you will pass forever from death into life.

To encourage you to do it, let us inquire further what the Gospel is, or just what God does to save a soul that trusts in him. "Paul, you say that the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation; tell us wherein its power lies, what is its essence, what is the heart of the Gospel?" Listen to his reply: "Therein is revealed a righteousness of God by faith unto faith." Observe, he does not say, as the King James Version makes him say, "The righteousness of God," but a righteousness of God. There is a real difference between these two expressions, for "the" righteousness of God is the righteousness which God is, while "a" righteousness of God is a righteousness which God gives, and this is what the sinner needs.

There is no good news, no glad tidings, necessarily, in telling a sinner that God is righteous. A poor lost sinner, such as all of us are by nature, can find no real joy or comfort in that fact, because he knows that one day he must stand before that righteous God in all his spiritual nakedness, in all the hideousness of his iniquity. Therefore, the more he realizes that God is righteous, the more he trembles at the thought of it. But tell him that God has a righteousness to bestow upon him as the free gift of his grace, a righteousness that perfectly and forever satisfies his justice, and you have communicated good news indeed. But this is the kind of righteousness of which Paul speaks.

and he means just what he does in another place when referring to Christ he says, "Who was made sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." Oh, what good news is this!

But that phrase, "by faith unto faith," is ambiguous; tell us what that means. Well, suppose instead of a preacher standing here tonight, I were a tradesman; suppose I had something to sell—a book, for example—this Bible. I hold it up to you and say, "Here is a book that can be obtained for cash. I offer it to you for cash; have you the cash to take it?" We all understand that very clearly, but that is practically what God says in this text. He has a righteousness, or a rightness, which can be obtained by faith, and he offers it through Christ to our faith, and says, "Have you the faith to take it?" This is the meaning of "a righteousness of God by faith unto faith."

But the Holy Spirit does not end the subject here. He keeps Paul talking about it, and amplifying it, until finally, in the fourth chapter, which was part of our Scripture lesson tonight, he is led to introduce Abraham as the great Old Testament example of how this grace works.

We all know the story of Abraham, how he promised him an heir through his wife Sarah, and how he and she had long passed the period when, in the course of nature, offspring would be born to them. The patriarch was troubled about it, and began to inquire of Jehovah. And one night he called him out to his tent door and bade him "look up at the stars." "Canst thou count them, Abraham?" "Nay, Lord!" "Nevertheless, so shall thy seed; believest thou this?" And Abraham replied, "Yea, Lord, I believe; in spite of reason and experience and all nature to the contrary, I take thee at thy word, I accept thy testimony as true." And in the same moment God "counted it to him for righteousness."

Imputed Righteousness

What does this mean? Just this: that Abraham, like all the rest of us, was born into this world into a state of sin, which is a state of wrongness in God's sight, and a state of death. But in that moment he accepted God's testimony as to the promised seed, God did, by an act of sovereign grace and power, lift him out of that state of wrongness and place him before himself in a state of rightness forevermore. It was not at a question of a change of character on Abraham's part, God took care of his character afterwards; but it was a question of his position or legal standing before God, which thereupon changed radically and irreversibly. This is what is meant by righteousness being imputed or counted unto him.

And the point is this: Paul says "it was imputed to him; but for us also, to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe on him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead; who was delivered for our offences and was raised again for our justification." Now perfectly plain and simple this makes it! You did I are born into a state of sin and wrongness in God's sight, and in infinite grace he puts our sin upon the person of his own Son, who died for us and rose again. He then presents that fact to us in the preaching of the Gospel, and asks us to believe it, and the moment we accept his testimony concerning Jesus Christ he counts it unto us for righteousness. In that moment, by an act of sovereign grace and power, he lifts us out of the state of wrongness and places us before him in a state of rightness forevermore. Like Abraham, it is not as yet a question of our change of character; God takes care of that in due time; but it becomes at once a change of our position or legal standing before God, and we thereafter are justified from all sin.

Who would not believe such a Gospel and thank God for it with all his heart? Jesus Christ is walking by your side tonight, and the turning point approaches. Harken as he says, "What way?" Thou knowest the way he goes, and thou knowest not say, "This way"? And when he asks, "For life?" wilt thou hesitate to answer, "Amen, Lord, life forevermore!" God help you to do it in his name's sake!

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON S. COOPER

Refreshed by Threats

SUNDAY, April 4. Revelation 2: 10: "Be thou faithful unto death!" Our faithfulness is the measure of our faith. When faithfulness ceases faith has collapsed. We may still carry a creed, we are not borne along by a faith. Faith is vital, and its only expression is life. If the living expression vanish it is because faith itself has become extinct. Faithfulness is the line of green grass, stretching across the otherwise barren waste, and revealing the presence and course of faith, the hidden running waters from which it derives its life and strength. Let the secret streams drip, and the grass will sicken and die.

I then, we examine the vigor of our faithfulness. We are also examining the quality of our faith. What can my faithfulness endure? How much of Irish noon? How much of chilling midnight? What sort of roads can it travel? Maybe it can travel the road from Bethany to Jerusalem, when palm branches are being waved and it has the company of a joyful multitude; but what about the road from Jerusalem to Jericho, where it travels alone, and where men frequently fall among thieves? "There are some men who rise refreshed on hearing a threat." Opposition acts like a tonic, and the exultingly survey their resources as danger draws near. Is it even so with my faithfulness when antagonisms flash like the gleam of a sword? Does it quicken its pace with a joyful cry, or does it turn aside to hide in dishonorable fear? Can it sin even in the pain of threat and disaster? Can it be "faithful unto death"?

We can make positive answer to all these questions if we diligently look to the increase of our faith. And blessed be God! even faith itself is a gift of grace. We can obtain the faith where we obtain the life. Our God gives the seed as well as matures the fruit. He is the author and finisher of our faith. Faith is the most wonderful gift in the treasury of Grace, for in the gift of faith all other gifts are concealed. "Lord, increase our faith!" J. H. J.

The Song That Gives Strength Amid Trials

MONDAY, April 5. Isaiah 26: 11-21. "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust." Many of us have been down in the dust, and some of us live there. We are conscious of sin and failure; we are filled with the contempt of the proud; we are perpetually reminded of our limitations. "We have not wrought any deliverance in the earth; neither have the inhabitants of the world fallen." This is a sorry light for the children of the eternal Father! But it need not last. "Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of dove covered with silver, and her pinions with yellow gold!" "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust!"

Awake and sing, because your sins, which are many, are all forgiven and put out of God's memory. Awake and sing, because he loves you as much today as at that happy hour when first you said, "Aha, Father!" Awake and sing, because you are accepted in the Beloved! Awake and sing, because God sees a way through your present difficulties to a sure standing-ground, where the water-floods cannot reach. Awake and sing, because you have such a God, such a hope, such an exceeding weight of glory awaiting you. Do not wait to feel or see, but begin to sing whilst the morning is still struggling with the night. "When Israel began to sing and to praise, the Lord set liars in wait against their enemies and they were smitten." But note two especial reasons for singing. (1) "Thy dew as the dew of herbs." The gentle dew of the Holy Spirit is distilling already on thy heart, refreshing and softening it. (2) "The earth shall cast forth its dead." There shall be an hour of resurrection, when all your joys and hopes shall live again in immortal beauty. F. B. M.

The Gospel of the Second Mile

TUESDAY, April 6. Matthew 5: 41. "And whoever shall compel thee to go one mile, go with him two." The words of Jesus seem often to our twentieth-century sense contradictory, puzzling and impossible to follow. We read constantly in the Gospels of the command to love our enemies, to forgive those who wrong us, to refrain from resisting evil, and to go the second mile with him who compels us to go with him the first mile. It seems a hard saying. The Sermon on the Mount and making a living do not seem to match. The problem was expressed recently by a young lawyer who wanted to be a Christian in his profession, but found the tide of business affairs in his community running strongly against the gospel of the Golden Rule. He asked, "How crooked can a man be and still be straight?"

At first sight the world seems to be organized on a fighting rather than on a peace basis. But Christ enunciated a higher law, a spiritual law, more potent than the law of physical force and human enmity, a law depending upon the spiritual weapons of forgiveness and goodwill even towards our enemies. It was the most daring and revolutionary experiment of the Christian scheme. Moreover, it worked; and it is the only law that really succeeds in the end. John G. Paton tried it in the South Seas, when he went single-handed and unarmed among the wild tribes, catching their spears in his unprotected hands. He lived to see the chief of the wild tribes in Christ's school. Every time a Christian has returned good for evil, refraining from taking all his "rights," he has gone "the second mile" with his enemy, and this highest law of spiritual conquest has been vindicated.

Have you had a taste of the indescribable joy of turning your hate into love and forgiving one who has wronged you? Have you given up something you wanted yourself for another and found that truly your sacrifice returned to you in double blessing? Have you, like Christ, dared to be misunderstood and criticized unjustly? If so, you have had a foretaste of this great Christian principle, which is to be the ultimate law of Christian civilization. It is the law of love without boundaries that overcomes the world. C. S. C.

The Things That Test Our Faith

WEDNESDAY, April 7. John 6: 1-15. "This he said to prove him; for he himself knew what he would do." Yes, Jesus always knows what he will do. He sees the end from the beginning. He is able to meet every emergency with absolute sufficiency. However awkward the position into which the great enemy of your soul has enticed you, Jesus understands and can make a way of escape. But how often he allows us to drift into difficulty which threatens disaster, that he may prove us. "It came to pass after these things that God did prove Abraham and said unto him, Abraham: and he said, Here am I." "Thou, O God, hast proved us, as silver is tried. Thou broughtest us into the net . . . but thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place."

When you are at your wits' end, do not look down, but up; not to your own resources, but to Christ's. Andrew went into a profound calculation. He figured out what each person in the crowd would be likely to require, even at the lowest estimate; then he multiplied this by the price of bread in the neighboring villages, and finally he fixed the total at two hundred pennyworth. Thirty-five dollars, of course, meant bankruptcy to their meager stores. But Andrew left Jesus out of the account, and that made all the difference. It is very beautiful when the soul understands that the hot and fiery trials, the crushing sorrows, the heart-breaking troubles are not to be its permanent experience. Fear none of those things that thou shalt suffer. They are only sent to prove the genuineness of thy faith and love; but in the meantime the great Alchemist is bending over the flame, intent on ridding the metal of the alloy. But he always knows how to deliver the godly out of their trials or provings. F. B. M.

The Rock-like Trust of the Righteous

THURSDAY, April 8. Job 19: 25-27. "But as for me, I know that my Redeemer liveth, and at last he will stand upon the earth; and after my skin, even this body, is destroyed, then without my flesh shall I see God." This is a passage we usually have quoted at times of death. Job uttered it when he was alive, and after he had suffered loss of goods, family and health, and the sympathy of his friends. They are among the immortal words of history, because they represent the experience of a man who could endure in his faithfulness to God even when he could not see why. There seemed indeed no evident practical purpose to all these calamities that befell him. Job lost everything but his faith and his patience. He did not give up the game of life; he did not stop believing in his Maker.

Job is the standing proof to us that the human soul can live without temporal rewards, without bodily health, without friends and home even—live upon the abundance of a resistless faith. Job was bigger than Old Testament Jewish theology, which made material prosperity the sign of God's approval and misfortunes the penalty for sin. Job stands out in the galaxy of Bible heroes as a man without the things that belong to the world, and who, in addition, could suffer and be strong. It is the real and supreme test of Christian faith, of Christian patience, to be able to trust God in conditions unfavorable to our love for him; to hold, even while we lose all else, the rugged conviction that God is not dead, that his purposes never fail, nor do they work uncongenially or banefully for those who are determined to do right though the heavens fall. It is not simply at the tomb but in the tempests of life that we need the immortal and patient faith of Job, expressed in the words: "I know that my Redeemer liveth." C. S. C.

Magnifying Jesus in Our Daily Lives

FRIDAY, April 9. Philippians 1: 14-30. "Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether by life or death." Oh that we might all be possessed by this holy passion! Zinzendorf once said: "I have but one passion—it is Jesus!" We are intent on magnifying our churches, our denominations, and too often (though we are not prone to admit it), ourselves; but how few are taken up with the one holy purpose of magnifying Jesus Christ, so that he may be greatness in the eyes of men, and they shall say as they look at us, "How great and beautiful He must be if this is one of his servants!"

These are considerations to put to ourselves each morning and night. In the morning: "I have to live and speak today so that the people I meet may think higher of Jesus my Lord"; and at night, "Have I done anything to make men think worse of Christ?" If so, may his forgiveness come to us as to Peter after his failure! Or, "Have I made Jesus more glorious in the thought of my companions?" If so, it is matter for humble thanksgiving and comfort.

Sometimes we have to magnify him in life. Right out in the midst of the crowd, the rush, the absorbing interests of the state, the business, or religious work, we have to set the Lord always before us. We must construe everything in the light of our great endeavor. This will be the determining factor in every conclusion and will turn the scale in each wavering decision.

Life is given to the least and obscurest. It is the most precious gift of any. Each has the chance of living for Christ; nay, of living Christ. Sometimes we have to magnify him in death. We bury our dearest hopes and plans; nay, we enter ourselves into the grave of neglect, of apparent defeat, of self-immolation. But does the soldier regret dying in the ditch if his king rides over him to victory? F. B. M.

Seeing the Divine Perfection Through Nature

SATURDAY, April 10. Luke 12: 27. "Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." In the gala period of another springtime let us worship in nature's cathedral, where birds and zephyrs sing, where every flower and tree speak of Him who has made everything beautiful in its time. Beauty was born when God said: "Let there be light!" Come, let us worship; let us bow down, let us commune with nature's God, look through the seen to the unseen; for the sky, field and mountains are but reflections of the beauty of his holiness.

These are God's galleries of art, poetry, music and beauty; the symbols of his inner being of love, goodness and truth. Holiness could not help being beautiful, beaming from the face of the glorious Creator of all color, form and splendors in his wondrous worlds.

Some worship only the reflection of his face in nature, the image instead of the Author, the painting instead of the grand Original, the esthetic and artistic rather than the ethic and real. The Greeks adored the bodily form of beauty and the cultured mind; but they failed to behold the perfection of the eternal Father. All the separate rays of beauty in language, nature, art and music, we may trace upward to the central majesty of the Son of righteousness. E. W. C.

ALTHOUGH as early as 1770 missions to the Eskimos of the Hudson Bay region were undertaken, these strange people are today but little under the influence of the church. Some of the tribes live so far north, surrounded by ice twelve months of the year, that it is almost impossible for a white man to reach them. Many of the natives have yet to set eyes on any but members of their own race. The more central tribes have come in contact with white people, but their customs and manner of life have been only slightly modified, and heathen they still remain. Those Eskimos who live closer to the southern limit of their ice-bound country are more or less under the influence of the missionaries—Moravian, Anglican and Roman Catholic.

It is only within the last few centuries that the Eskimos have become a circumpolar race. They used to live far south of their present limits, which are now the Turnavik Islands on the Labrador, Fort George on the east coast of Hudson Bay, and Churchill on the west.

When the northern parts of Canada were first opened up to the European discoverer, the Eskimos were to be found along the north shore of the St. Lawrence. Their hereditary enemies, the Indians, waged an intermittent warfare with them, and many a bloody battle took place on the southern Labrador. Then the Europeans came on the scene and the Indian, the first of the two aboriginal races to come into possession of firearms, gained the upper hand. The less fortunate Eskimos were compelled to retreat north.

Slowly they were driven back, farther and farther north, till, reaching the barrens of the sub-arctic regions, they stood, defended by Nature's barriers. Far into the frozen wastes beyond the timber limit the Indian dared not venture. His only fuel was wood, whereas the more ingenious Eskimo made use of the oils of the sea animals, and the stone lamp in his igloo gave him ample protection from the Arctic frost.

Here for a time the harassed Eskimos were comparatively safe. But the racial enmity continued. The blood-lust, nurtured in the breasts of the Dogribs and Chippewyan Indians, was so strong that about the year 1770, when Samuel Hearne, the explorer, made his journey down the Coppermine River, a band of the latter tribe accompanied him solely for the purpose of making a raid on their Northern enemies. The explorer was rewarded by valuable discoveries, whilst the bloodthirsty savages satisfied their craving with the massacre of an entire Eskimo band. Such was the strength of the racial hatred.

The unequal warfare continued for years, until the arrival of the whalers in the waters of the North. The advent of these and their accompanying traders marked the beginning of an era in which the Eskimos became freed from their ancient enemies, only to have thrust into their midst an evil whose far-reaching effects are being deplored today.

The Moravians, the first missionaries to enter this Northern field, arrived on the Labrador coast in the year 1770. They established a string of stations from Hamilton Inlet to Cape Chidley. Hebron, Ramah, Nackvek and Eclipse Harbor are some of these. About the stations the Moravians have collected the natives in bands and have kept them as free as possible from contact with the floating white fishing population. To do this they obtained exclusive trading rights from the Newfoundland Government, and the proceeds from the trade enable them to maintain the stations. The natives operate seal fisheries and are taught to provide for themselves by work of one kind or another. From long contact with the missionaries the Moravian Eskimos have become devout Christians, and now conform closely to the manners and customs of civilization.

An Anglican mission was started over ten years ago by the Rev. Mr. Peck at Blackhead Island on the Cumberland Gulf. With two assistants he reached the natives living on a two-hundred stretch of coast. Five years ago he established station at Lake Harbor on the north side of Foulson Strait, and later passed the work on to younger men. There are few today who have a more intimate knowledge of the Hudson Bay and Baffin Eskimos than this veteran pioneer of Arctic missionary work. His successor at Lake Harbor, Mr. Broughton, was brought out two years ago on the Hudson Bay Company steamer Nascopie, having been so badly frozen in a blizzard that a time his life was despaired of. He recovered, however, and returned to his charge. At Churchill, on the west coast of the bay, an Anglican missionary is carrying on work among the natives who each spring journey down from the north to spend the summer about the posts.

Thus a certain amount of education and insight into the white man's religion are being spread among the scattered members of the more southern tribes. These, in turn, will carry the instruction into more distant fields, inaccessible to the white man, and the far-reaching influence of the Christian doctrines may tend to wean the most savage natives from their ancient customs and beliefs.

On a little schooner, held fast in the ice fields of Hudson Strait, I met and lived for a time with the Rev. Mr. Peck. At the conclusion of an interesting story, embracing the lives of the two peoples, the Eskimos and the Indians, with whom he had so long and patiently labored, I asked, "Which do you think is really the superior race?"

"The Eskimos, by all means," he answered. "They are far more energetic, industrious and proud than the Indians. Bright and cheerful of disposition, as against the sullen, silent nature of the other, they are a very active race and will do twice the labor that an Indian would accomplish."

"But they are fast dying off," added the veteran missionary. "Nearly all have tubercular or other diseases, and the mortality exceeds by far the rate. That is the whalers' legacy left to the offensive, contented Eskimo."

MADE IN THE UNITED STATES

STEP by step the idea of definitely exploiting the industries of the United States of America has progressed, until several decidedly impressive results have now been achieved. Long before the present European war broke out, American manufacturers had recognized the tremendous advertising power the few words "Made in Germany" had proved for that country, and the city of Detroit offered a prize of $500 for a suitable stamp to be used on goods "Made in U. S. A." A condition of the contest was that the winning design was to become the property of the people of the whole United States, and not merely of Detroit business men. In appreciation of this broadly patriotic attitude of the Detroit Board of Commerce, the El Paso, Texas, Chamber of Commerce came to the front with an additional prize of $50. Four of the five judges were chosen from other cities: Chicago, Milwaukee and New York.

The winning design, chosen from 119,000 submitted by citizens of the United States, consists of an American eagle with wings extended, in blue, on which appear the words, MADE IN, in white; underneath the eagle the word Detroit, and below that the letters "U. S. A.", in red, the whole symbolizing the American shield. The name of the city may be omitted or changed without impairing the design.

The war gave an added impetus to such suggestions. The women of the nation took up the idea. A convention was held in Chicago to encourage American fashions for American women, and in New York the other day a fashion parade showed costumes made in America of American goods, and of American design. With the new year came the organization of the Women's National Made in U. S. A. League, with the wives of several cabinet officers as its sponsors, and its purpose to enlist American housewives in the common cause of buying American goods by securing the signatures of 20,000,000 women to this agreement: "I pledge myself for the welfare of my country, while the war lasts, to demand and buy wherever possible only things made in the United States, and to urge my friends to do likewise."

Meanwhile organized movements have arisen all over the United States for a series of Made in U. S. A. demonstrations. As spring approached, when buyers from all sections of this and other countries come to New York, plans were made for the first national Made in U. S. A. Exposition, to stimulate the sale of American goods both in home and foreign markets, and to educate the world as to the resources of this country. Supplementing the general exposition committee an advisory committee was appointed, with Mrs. Charles S. Whitman, wife of the governor, as chairman, and including the women most prominent in the philanthropic and social life of the city.

An infant's coat, made of white silk, from the mills of Paterson, N. J., lined with pale blue and trimmed with ribbon made in a Pennsylvania factory, was presented by the women of the committee to Mrs. Whitman for the new baby in the Executive Mansion. At a luncheon given by the committee, the menu was printed on rose-colored satin, made in U. S. A. mills, all the food was purchased here, all the ornaments, favors and souvenirs made in this country, and every member wore a costume designed and made in America of materials produced here. Women played an important part in the exposition, and are already arranging for a woman's industrial exposition to be held in April, to illustrate all phases of women's activities.

The exhibits at the national exposition were arranged in an effort to exploit our own goods among our own people, and also to encourage the manufacture of goods which have been made abroad but which it has been proved can be made in this country as well, as cheaply, and with as great profit to the manufacturers. The one requirement was that every article exhibited must have been grown or manufactured in the U. S. A. or that it should represent American achievement. The result was comprehensive, covering a varied and extensive range, from lamps to lobsters, from soup to suffrage, from vegetable shredders to temperance lunch wagons. For the Made in U. S. A. movement consists of something beside "the wheels that go round." Not only are industrial and commercial, agricultural and zoographical possibilities presented, but also something of the civic and philanthropic interests which have had much to do with the making of the U. S. A.

Under a group of tiny flags call nations and a motto "The only flag found under every flag," was a display of Bibles by the American Bible Society.

Among the various entertainments offered by the exposition was a lecture on Temperance Day given by Rev. Robert J. Patterson, "Catch-Me-I-Patterson." The Women's Church Temperance Union displayed in effective prominence two cartoons labeled respectively "Made in U. S. A.: The Output," a drunken man in the gutter, and "Made in U. S. A.: The Finest Product," a drunken woman on a doorstep.

"The temperance people are showing the efficiency end of temperance, not the sentimental end. Railroad and manufacturing corporations demand temperance because men can accomplish so much more," said Mr. Albert R. Rogers, commissioner of education in Boston, who was "loaned" by Mayor Curley of Boston to supervise the educational features.

HIS PRAISE IN SONG

We Shall Know Them

How shall we know them in His stainless regions,
Our friends before us home now with the Lord?
He shall we find, amidst the ransomed legions,
The comrades long in tender memory stored?

He will they come—with what new form invested?
All we behold our loved ones once again,
Win we by sin no more shall be molested,
At, pure at last, with our own Lord shall reign?

"I know in part." At Jesus' resurrection,
When he the Magdalene had called by name,
She knew his voice; she caught the old inflection
Love that banished all her fear and shame.

The Master, calling to his children, tired
From fishing through the night with no reward,
Was known by them; the words his heart desired
He heard, and trembling cried: "It is the Lord!"

By look and deed, in rare and blissful meeting,
His disciples was the Master known;
The forty days with him were all too fleeting,
Before he ascended to his Father's throne:

O son Lord, first fruit of those who, sleeping,
We laid aside the cumbrous robe of earth,
We shall be like thee, sheltered in thy keeping;
We'll know in truth thy resurrection's worth.

As we shall know those, for a while departed,
Nay, Jesus' own, they shall like him arise—
Your voice, your touch, well known, O friends true-hearted;
Your beaming smile; your tender, loving eyes.

Dear ones, at home "with Christ, which is far better,"
Passed to the heritage of fairer lines—
Though freed from all that mind and heart can fetter,
We'll know them by the old familiar signs.

Like happy children, curious and eager
For Christmas morning, breaking with surprise,
Beyond our dreams and speculations meager,
We wait the joys ne'er seen by mortal eyes.

When for the loved ones to thy glory entered
We can but long and long with aching heart—
Then, Friend unseen, be our strong purpose centered
On winning here below the better part.

At thy dear feet, oft let us be reclining,
As those passed onward sat and learned thy ways,
Thus, Lord, anear them here, with service shining,
May we unite in their triumphant praise!

Home; home—in thine own time thy children bringing,
Oh, make us steadfast pilgrims of the night;
Till, songs of Easter Day in glory singing,
We'll come, with loved ones waiting, to thy light.

RICHARD ARNOLD GREENE.

Easter Everywhere

REJOICE today, though skies be gray
And never sunshine seen;
Though flowers beneath deep snow delay,
And songs of birds be far away,
And winds be shrill and keen.
Rejoice, O Earth!
Rejoice and sing!
There is no dearth
Of praise to bring.

No frost nor heat our joys can mar,
For Easter brings delight
Though Southern Cross or Polar Star
Be high in heaven or glimmering far
Near sea or plain tonight.
Rejoice, O Earth!
Rejoice and sing
Of our new birth
Beyond death's sting.

Up, Christians all. Each heart has need
Of our most happy lay.
Around the world the gladdening creed,
"The Spring has come," today must speed
Because 'tis Easter Day.
Rejoice, O Earth!
Rejoice and sing
With hearty mirth!
The year's all spring.

Where hearts are glad, spring fills the year.
Lord, keep us ever free
From faithless sorrow, grief and fear.
O risen Christ, to us draw near;
Our joy begins in thee.
Rejoice, O Earth!
Rejoice and sing!
And praise the host
Of Christ our King.

MALCOLM SANDERS JOHNSTON.

Two Hours

TWO hours outshine upon the roll of Time
All other earthly hours as stars aloof;
One tells the moment, throbbing and sublime,
When He was born beneath the stable roof,
Whose advent hosts of winging angels sang,
While all the sky with alleluias rang.

The other, when, with glad unerring wing,
The Easter Angel at command divine
Unsealed the stone and Love rose triumphing; (That tomb, were he unrisen, were mine and thine.)
For the first hour, all earthly hours are named,
But for the other's sake, a lost world is reclaimed.

CHAPTER XXIV

THE GAME AND POLLYANNA

BEFORE the middle of September the Carews and Sadie Dean said good-by and went back to Boston. Much as she knew she would miss them, Pollyanna drew an equal sigh of relief as the train bearing them away rolled out of the Belvidere station. Pollyanna would not have admitted having this feeling of relief to anyone else, and even to herself she apologized in her thoughts. "It isn't that I don't love them dearly, every one of them," she sighed, watching the train disappear around the curve, far down the track. "It's only that—that I'm so sorry for poor Jamie all the time; and—and—I am tired. I shall be glad, for a while, just to go back to the old quiet days with Jimmy."

Pollyanna, however, did not go back to the old quiet days with Jimmy. The day that immediately followed the going of the Carews were quiet, certainly, but they were not passed with Jimmy. Jimmy rarely came near the house now, and when he did call, he was not the old Jimmy that she used to know. He was moody, restless and silent, or else very gay and talkative in a nervous fashion that was most puzzling and annoying. Before long, to his own surprise, he went to Boston; and that, of course, she did not see him at all.

Pollyanna was surprised then to see how much she missed him. Even to know that he was in town, and that there was a chance that he might come over, was better than the dreary emptiness of certain absence; and even his puzzling moods of alternating gloominess and gaiety were preferable to his utter silence of nothingness. Then, one day, suddenly she pulled herself up with hot cheeks and shamed eyes.

"Well, Pollyanna Whittier," she upbraided herself sharply, "one would think you were in love with Jimmy Bean Pendleton! Can't you think of anything but him?"

Whereupon, forthwith, she bestirred herself to be very gay and lively indeed, and to put this Jimmy Bean Pendleton out of her thoughts. As it happened, Aunt Polly, though unwittingly, helped her to this.

With the going of the Carews had gone also their chief source of immediate income, and Aunt Polly was beginning to worry again, audibly, about the state of their finances.

"I don't know, really, Pollyanna, what is going to become of us," she would moan frequently. "Of course we are a little ahead now for this summer's work, and we shall have a small sum from the estate right along; but I never know how soon that's going to stop, like all the rest. If only we could do something to bring in some ready cash!"

It was after one of these bemoaning lamentations one day that Pollyanna's eyes chanced to fall on a prize-story contest offer. It was a most alluring one. The prizes were large and numerous. The conditions were set forth in glowing terms. To read it, one would think that to win out were the easiest thing in the world. It contained even a special appeal that might have been framed for Pollyanna herself.

"This is for you—you who read this," it ran. "What if you never have written a story before? That is no sign that you can not write one. Try it. That's all. Wouldn't you like three thousand dollars? Two thousand? One thousand? Five hundred, or even one hundred? Then why not go after it?"

"The very thing!" cried Pollyanna, clapping her hands. "I'm so glad I saw it! And it says I can do it, too.

I thought I could, if I'd just try. I'll go tell auntie so she needn't worry any more."

Pollyanna was on her feet and half way to the door when a second thought brought her steps to a pause.

"Come to think of it, I reckon I won't, after all. It'll be all the nicer to surprise her; and if I should get the first one—!"

Pollyanna went to sleep that night planning what she could do with that three thousand dollars.

Pollyanna began her story the next day. That is, she, with a very important air, got out a quantity of paper, sharpened up half-a-dozen pencils, and established herself at the big old-fashioned Harrington desk in the living-room. After biting restlessly at the ends of two of her pencils, she wrote down three words on the fair white page before her. Then she drew a long sigh, threw aside the ruined pencil, and picked up a slender green one with a beautiful point. This point she eyed with a meditative frown.

"Oh, dear! I wonder where they get their titles," she despaired. "Maybe, though, I ought to decide on the story first, and then make a title fit. Anyhow, I'm going to do it." And forthwith she drew a black line through the three words and poised the pencil for a fresh start.

The start was not made at once, however. Even when it was made, it must have been a false one, for at the end of half an hour the whole page was nothing but a jumble of scratched-out lines, with only a few words here and there left to tell the tale.

At this juncture Aunt Polly came into the room. She turned tired eyes upon her niece.

"Well, Pollyanna, what are you up to now?" she demanded.

Pollyanna laughed and colored guiltily.

"Nothing much, auntie. Anyhow, it doesn't look as if it were much—yet," she admitted, with a rueful smile. "Besides, it's a secret, and I'm not going to tell it yet."

"Very well; suit yourself," sighed Aunt Polly. "But I can tell you right now that if you're trying to make anything different out of those mortgage papers Mr. Hart left, it's useless. I've been all over them myself twice."

"No, dear, it isn't the papers. It's a whole heap nicer than any papers ever could be," crowed Pollyanna triumphantly, turning back to her work. In Pollyanna's eyes suddenly had risen a glowing vision of what it might be, with that three thousand dollars once hers.

For still another half-hour Pollyanna wrote and scratched, and chewed her pencils; then, with her courage dulled, but not destroyed, she gathered up her papers and pencils and left the room.

"I reckon maybe I'll do better by myself upstairs," she was thinking as she hurried through the hall. "I thought I ought to do it at a desk—being literary work, so—but anyhow, the desk didn't help me any this morning. I'll try the window seat in my room."

The window seat, however, proved to be no more inspiring, judging by the scratched and re-scratched pages that fell from Pollyanna's hands; and at the end of another half hour Pollyanna discovered suddenly that it was time to get dinner.

"Well, I'm glad 'tis, anyhow," she sighed to herself. "I'd a lot rather get dinner than do this. Not but that I want to do this, of course; only I'd no idea 'twas such an awful job—just a story, so!"

During the following month Pollyanna worked faithfully, doggedly, but she soon found that "just a story, so" was indeed no small matter.

Make Earth Like Heaven

EASTER and Revival! There will be new gladness in the Easter anthem this year because the long-looked-for revival has come. Reports herald the glad tidings of almost unprecedented spiritual blessing throughout our own and other lands. Even in the midst of the anguish of war, souls are being blessed by the power of God. Nineteen-fifteen may yet go down to history, not as the year of carnage, but the year of salvation. The very horror of the war has driven the minds of men back from the ghastly incongruities and inefficiencies of civilization, back through all the gloom and mire and quicksands of life to Christ—the great Foundation, the world's one Light and Hope.

The revival means new life. Fields and hills are green again, and the blossoms are on their way. Sunshine, and fragrance, and the tonic of the clear spring air—as these refresh our minds and bodies, so the reviving grace of God may refresh our souls. We open our lungs to the healing air of spring; we open home windows to let in spring fragrance and sunshine. So soul doors and church doors should open to let in the Easter glories of the new revival.

That new revival must have a distinct social result upon the new age. While it must be, as all the great revivals of the past have been, pre-eminently a spiritual matter, bringing individual souls into vital, affectionate communion with Christ, there will be in it a fresh social emphasis. The church must translate the new life of the soul into new deeds for the welfare of men. The newer and sweeter conceptions of the divine Fatherhood must be interpreted into new terms of human brotherhood.

Easter—Revival—War! What could be more grotesquely incongruous than that that hideous third word should force itself into our thoughts even while we are pondering the bliss and glory of the other two? Is that fact not a challenge—a challenge that in the new light and the new power from heaven men shall find and destroy the causes of human strife? With the strains of the Easter anthems and the revival songs in our ears, the clash of armies, the groans of dying men, the sobs of women and the wailing of little children are known to be what they are—the work of hell.

And we, one by one, can help Christ put an end to sin and strife throughout the world. As we let the flood of his resurrection life fill our souls, as we let his Spirit dominate our thoughts and acts, as we set ourselves against greed and wrong and strife, living the life of peace and helpfulness and hope, so shall we have some definite part in transforming earth into the likeness of heaven.

The Rights of Neutrals

SUMMED up in the briefest terms, the "order in council" issued by the British Government, formally announcing the nature and scope of the Allies' long-range blockade, may be characterized as a prohibitive mandate to all the neutral nations against trading with Germany. It serves notice on Italy, Holland, Spain, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Greece, Bulgaria, Rumania, the United States and the Southern republics that sea traffic with Germany, Austria and Turkey is forbidden. Neutral vessels carrying cargoes to or from the ports of any of those three powers are liable to seizure at any point within the "radius of activities" of an indefinite naval war zone, which apparently takes in the whole North Atlantic and Mediterranean coasts. In the diplomatic notes on the subject the Allies for the first time employ the term "blockade," but explain that the soft pedal is to be applied in dealing with neutrals, in order that they may experience a minimum of inconvenience. It is not intended to interfere with neutral vessels outside of European waters, of course, the notes explain, and there need be no apprehensions that neutral ships will be sunk or the lives of neutral non-combatants needlessly sacrificed. Further, our acquiescence in all of this program is suggested, in view of the fact that the changed conditions of war have made the old form of blockade impracticable.

But this consideration for neutral interests does not seem to have produced the effect intended, for we find the neutral nations, with singular unanimity, resenting the right of any combination of powers to practically tie up the legitimate sea commerce of a large part of the globe. No power in the world has a right to set itself above the law of nations. Every one of the neutral countries has certain rights in common with other neutrals. These rights are guaranteed by international law, which is founded upon the fundamental principles that govern the relations of civilized nations. If the object aimed at were a true blockade, it would be a different problem; but nowhere is it shown that this is a true blockade. In the absence of an actual blockade, there is nothing in international law or custom to forbid neutrals trading in non-contraband. This will be, in part at least, the basis of the protest now in preparation by the neutrals. It is not enough to be assured that neutral vessels and legitimate cargoes will be treated with consideration, that humane principles will be observed and that hardships to neutrals will be minimized. Nor is the question merely one of our trade with Germany and Austria, which is so insignificant that a true blockade of these two countries could affect us but little. It is for the recognition of a high principle, fixed by international law, and involving the freedom of ocean commerce, that our government and our fellow neutrals must make their stand. If this cannot be established, and if our flag must no longer float on the seas because it is illegally forbidden, then let us confess that international law has ceased and that international intercourse, welfare and justice have disappeared, under the plea of military necessity.

A Wife and Her Earnings

A GASP of dismay, coupled with indignation, rose throughout the country when a learned judge decided a few days ago that money earned by a married woman was, according to law, the property of her husband. This may be the case, and doubtless is, for a learned judge has so declared. But it is certainly not equity, and our prognostication is that the various women's organizations, suffragist and anti-suffrage alike, will unite in making efforts to get the law changed on this point.

The old law on which this decision is based rests on the ancient assumption that woman is more or less of a chattel. Modern thought insists that woman has a soul, an independent soul, and has the same right as a man to work out, unhindered, her personal destiny.

It is to be feared that many men—and it is not unlikely that some of them are church members—need to have their convictions and opinions about the monetary rights of women altogether revised. While most men would scorn to take the earnings of their wives, many men accept the time and strength of their wives without realizing that these have definite monetary value and should be recompensed. Many women dread even to ask their husbands for needed money, whereas it is the husband's duty to provide unasked and regularly what money a wife may need for her personal use.

This modern ratification of an ancient and iniquitous law will lead to some readjustments which will bring woman still nearer to the independence and opportunities which must be hers.

Evangelism as an Asset

NOW that Evangelist Sunday's spiritual campaign in Philadelphia has closed, after nearly three months of continuous services and record-breaking audiences, the work he has accomplished is such as may well give serious pause to those who have affected to despise the methods of modern evangelism. With remarkable unanimity the public and press of Philadelphia pay him the tribute of having conducted the most unique spiritual movement ever witnessed in that city. Its influence has been felt throughout a large part of Pennsylvania, southern New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland. The vast audiences have been far in excess of anything ever known in those states, if not, indeed, in any state. It is estimated that the united attendances aggregate 1,600,000—equal to the entire population of Philadelphia. Of this multitude, thousands signed pledge cards and "hit the trail." In its spiritual results, too, the work was phenomenal. Ten thousand who had backslidden into sin renewed their vows to the churches, while a much larger number made their first confession of saving faith and started in the new life, won by the evangelist's plain, outspoken presentation of the old Gospel.

Small in stature, nervous, emotional, and with the burden of souls on his mind day and night, it would have surprised nobody if he had broken down under the strain. But the same power that drew him into the battle sustained him to the close. Why should any signal success on the part of a pastor or evangelist be made a mark for condemnation instead of congratulation? It is not so with successful men in other callings. Many a lawyer has earned a fee far in excess of any sum ever paid an evangelist. Let a physician, a corporation president, a successful author or the executive head of any large concern receive a princely income, and he is praised and commended; but if an evangelist, who has done service to society at large and in the means, under God, of transforming a multitude of human lives, receive a generous free-will offering, he is at once condemned. And this thought makes no demand, but leaves the people themselves to estimate the value of his work. It seems to us that the real question about Billy Sunday is not whether he uses the language of the vulgarian dealing with the crowds who gather to hear him, but whether he is really an asset to the church and the cause of Christianity. Paul declared his purpose to become all things to all men, if by any means he might save some. If in his Philadelphia campaign Evangelist Sunday succeeded in dragging over 40,000 into the right attitude of clean, wholesome Christian living he certainly is an asset to be taken into account in the reckoning, as the united testimony of three hundred churches has declared.

The President on "Captains of Industry"

IT HAS remained for a President of the United States to do justice to the great captains of industry. In a little book just issued by the Harpers, which is in the nature of a biographical essay, President Wilson reviews the career of a number of Americans who have come to the front in large enterprises and great benevolences. The note of his volume may be found in his observations on the late George Foster Peabody, of whom he writes that he, like others, was not fascinated by the glitter of gold, but rather was "in love with the exercise of his own faculties on a great scale. . . . It was this fascination," he wrote, "that got upon the faculties of the man whom the world afterwards to know, not as a prince among merchants, but as a prince among benefactors; beneficence breeds gratitude, gratitude admiration, and the world remembers its benefactors." To such natures, beneficence becomes interesting as business; indeed, the President remarks, it is a sort of sublimated business, in which money moves new forces in commerce which no man can bound or limit. It is in this sense that he believes "a man comes to himself," and realizes the great opportunities of service that are open to him. But there is a proviso attached to such careers. He holds that they are only open to those who "detach themselves from tasks and drudgery enough to get a view of the proportions of life and the stage plot of its action." President Wilson has that it is a popular error to imagine that the great captains of industry are wedded to the mere pursuit of money. Unusual display by their families and dependents may give this impression, he admits; but they themselves, he believes, are too busy as a rule with their sober thoughts to give time to mere matters of display. The book, though just published, is really a souvenir of the professional days of fifty years ago, but the reasonable presumption is that the writer still holds the same views. They are interesting but partial and generously optimistic, rather than discriminative; for unfortunately all the great captains of industry have belonged to the high-souled class he has idealized in his essay. It was evidently written in the days of his early enthusiasms, before he had acquired a working experience with the subject. The world has changed its opinions somewhat since then, and the last ten years of administrative history have shown repeated instances in which the captains of industry came for their share of discipline for the safety and welfare of the greater number, and that the process of accumulating vast fortunes was one to be jealously watched and regulated rather than unstintingly encouraged and applauded.

Mother's Pension Bill Passed

—THE NEW YORK STATE SENATE has passed the Widow's Mother's Pension bill and its adoption by the Assembly is known for. It is now coming to be very generally recognized, in states that have already enacted a widow's pension law, that a wise and an economical substitute for a certain class of public institutions devoted to the care of half orphans, and that class is better cared for and trained at home than in institutions in the long run, and at less cost to the state.

The BIBLE and NEWSPAPER

CONDUCTED BY
FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Fire Company with Smoke Helmets

A RESCUE Company No. 1 in the Fire Department of New York City has been organized by Commissioner Robert Adamson to conquer the smoke and kill the fire at the start. The two officers and eight men of Reue No. 1 are equipped and have been trained to enter sub-c llars that are filled with highly carbonated smoke, ammonia fumes and chemical gases and to bore their way into the holds of burning ships and quench fires before they have gained helway. They are able to do this by reason of smoke helmets, containing sufficient oxygen to furnish proper air for breathing for the space of an hour and a half. Telephone attachments to the headgear enable the officers to converse with chiefs on the sidewalk and to report the progress of the fight. Last year there was a fire in a tobacco factory, in which fifty-five firemen were rendered unconscious. This led Fire Commissioner Adamson to see for some better provision to fight such smoke. He found on investigation that London, Berlin and other European cities had in use the very device he needed. He purchased the very best helmets and other equipments needed, set his men to drill in the deadly fumes, and now has his Rescue Company No. 1 ready for business. Prevention of fire is the best thing; putting it out at the start is the next best; the worst is to let it grow into a terrific blaze and then fight desperately to extinguish it. It is tremendously important to stamp out the fires of moral evil in the heart at the start, before the flames of appetite and evil habit have burst in a deadly conflagration, destroying conscience and love. The prophet thus likens evil in the human heart to a fierce fire: "For wickedness burneth as thfire: it shall devour the briars and thorns, and shall kindle in the thickets of the forest, and they shall mount up like the lifting up of smoke." (Isa. 9: 3.)

Disastrous Pie-Eating Contest

TWO men in a restaurant in a large city the other day entered into an argument as to which could eat the most. They agreed that a test should be made as to which could eat the largest number of mince pies. Each had eaten three and as one of them undertook to eat the fourth he sank down in his chair in agony. The ambulance was called, but he was dead when he reached the hospital. Such is the story as it appeared in several day newspapers. There are thousands that kill themselves as surely, though not so swiftly, as this man did. Most people, especially in sedentary life, eat too much. The glutton makes a close race with the drunkard for the cemetery. Spenser, in describing the vices that drew the chariot in which the queen rode, makes gluttony one of the most disgusting of them. There is this severe Biblical admonition of the glutton: "This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice; he is a glutton, and a drunkard." (Deut. 21: 20.)

Girl Rescues Drowning Man

MISS ELSIE DITSON, a young society woman of Paterson, N. J., was driving her automobile along the road by a pond at Cedar Grove when she heard a man's voice from the pond, crying, "I'm drowning! Save me!" She ran and found that a young man, while skating, had fallen into the water and was drowning. She ran back to her car and unstrapped an extra tire from the side. Singing a clothesline hanging near a barn down the road, she hurried, and, seizing it, tied it to the tire and threw it out to the man as a life-preserver. He put both arms through the tire just as he was about gone. The girl tried in vain to pull him out. Then she ran her car up close enough to the pond to tie the clothesline to its spring, and then, driving at half-speed, she pulled him out. How much woman's brains, and tact, and energy, and sympathy have done in the physical and moral salvation of men! It is a rather unsafe proposition for a young woman to marry a young man with the idea of reforming him, and numbers have been punished in the attempt. But many women have, by their ability, character and love, saved young men from drowning in the sea of temptations into which they have fallen. If the young man had not availed himself of the improvised life-preserver he would have instantly perished. How passing strange it is that so many men and women, young and old, will not make use of the spiritual life-preserver thrown to them, and perish! This question can be seriously asked: "How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?" (Heb. 2: 3.)

NEWLY FORMED RESCUE CREW AND APPARATUS, NEW YORK FIRE DEPARTMENT

Library Books Widely Circulated

NEW YORK CITY points with just pride to the fact that during the past year 12,000,000 books were used by the people, an average of over two books to every man, woman and child. The cost to the city was about eleven cents for each book used, and less than twenty-five cents per capita. The children of the city took out the astounding number of 3,580,000. What a blessing to the millions of the poor, who have no books, is the public circulating library! There were books in olden time, written, of course, by hand. The apostle's desire for books is thus expressed: "The cloak that I left at Troas with Carpus bring with thee, and the books, especially the parchments." (II Tim. 4: 13.)

Mrs. Rockefeller Passes Away

MRS. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER died suddenly at her home at Pocantico Hills, N. Y., on March 12. Her husband and her son, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., who were in Florida, returned by special train for the funeral. Mrs. Rockefeller, before her marriage, was Laura Celestia Spelman, daughter of a well-to-do merchant of Ohio, who did business at Wadsworth, Akron and Cleveland. She was a woman of intellectual ability and liberal education. She was exceedingly simple in her habits and democratic in her tastes, even to the last. A poor person, if worthy, had as much of her attention and affection as one possessed of wealth. Amidst great wealth she counted simple home life and duty the main things, and took her highest enjoyment in them. She taught her daughters to work and keep house as though they had been the children of poverty. Mrs. Rockefeller was intensely religious, being a Congregationalist before and a Baptist after her marriage. She was old-fashioned in her views on questionable amusements and personal habits. She was a devoted student of the Bible. At the funeral a quartette of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York, rendered the favorite hymns of Mrs. Rockefeller: "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," "Love that Will Not Let Me Go," "Nearer, My God, to Thee," and "Now the Day is Over." Rev. Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin, of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, pastor of the family, made touching remarks. Thus passed from earth one whose worldly circumstances might have tempted her to pride, vanity, ease and self-indulgence, but who lived a sincere, simple life, a true wife and mother. The words of the wise man can be here applied: "She openeth her mouth with wisdom; and in her tongue is the law of kindness. She looketh well to the ways of her household." (Prov. 31: 26, 27.)

Fire, Dynamite and Hero

WORKMEN were engaged in making a new track on the New York Central Railroad at Beacon, N. Y., when a fire was discovered in a little wooden shed in which were stored two tons of dynamite. All ran for safety and the alarm was given the people of the neighborhood to escape the terrible explosion momentarily expected. Three hundred children were hurriedly marched from a public school. One of the gang of workmen ran toward the shed, though he must have known that the chances of escape from being blown to pieces were few. Onlookers shuddered at the certain death into which they thought he was going. The blaze was burning fiercely, but at last he got the fire under control. Neither the men who own the railroads nor the financial princes who are passengers upon them have more superb manhood than this simple workingman who felt somewhat of responsibility as a representative of the company, but who realized that many lives were in peril, and risked his own to save them. Though the man did not suffer, his act is an imitation of the example and an illustration of the spirit of the One who saved others but had to lose his own life in doing so, and of whom it was said: "He saved others; himself he cannot save." (Matt. 27: 42.)

Bird and Snake Fight

CHARLES SNYDER, keeper of the reptile house at the Bronx Zoological Park, New York, emptied a big black snake out of a basket in the ostrich house as a meal for Bill, one of the two secretary birds in the collection. It is the habit of these birds to leap four feet in the air and come down with stiff legs on the snake and trample it to death. Bill missed his victim, which coiled about his legs and gave him no end of trouble, till his mate came to his rescue and the two killed and ate the reptile. There is the bird nature with wings to fly above the earth, and a snake nature with fangs and poison, and the two are ever at war with each other. Plato graphically described it, and so does Paul in this language: "For they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the spirit, the things of the spirit." (Rom. 8: 5.)

Grover Cleveland's Memory Honored

THE fourth annual memorial service under the auspices of the Grover Cleveland Birthplace Memorial Association was held the other day in the Presbyterian Church of Caldwell, N. J., under the presidency of Dr. John H. Finley, state commissioner of education for New York. Before the pulpit was placed a portrait of the former President, presented to the association by Charles R. Crane of Chicago. Nine hundred were present. Up to his time there had been no Democrat elected to the presidency since the beginning of the Civil war. Grover Cleveland had a firm belief in the Bible, the atonement, and the efficacy of prayer. During his last years he manifested a vital religious experience. Whether people agreed with his views on public policies or not, all believed him to be a man of moral courage and sterling honesty. The exercises at Caldwell illustrate the fact that "The memory of the just is blessed." (Prov. 10: 7.)

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

WAR ROBS BISMARCK OF HIS DUE. Festivals are planned for all Germany and in several American cities to celebrate the centenary of the birth of Prince Otto Eduard Leopold Bismarck, April 1. Various organizations have sent out programs, and in New York City there will be notable gatherings. The war in Europe has caused the world to focus its attention upon that great statesman's "blood and iron" policy at a moment when, had peace prevailed, universal praise for his many wonderful achievements would have been given without stint. Bismarck, the personification of German nationality, was born in Schoenhausen, Magdeburg, April 1, 1815, apparently for the purpose of creating out of the quarreling German and Prussian states the united Germany of today. He overcame the short-sighted but tremendous opposition to his policies by virtue of the persistency and thoroughness which characterized him, and lived to receive the sincere homage of those whom he defeated in the field of diplomacy.

PASSPORT FRAUD PROVEN. The attempt to manufacture and use a fraudulent United States passport, which has agitated official Washington, resulted in the conviction of two of the conspirators, Cook and Madden, in the Federal District Court, New York, March 18; and Richard P. Stegler, to whom the passport was issued and who turned state's evidence and tried to implicate a member of the German embassy at Washington, Captain Boy-Ed, is self-convicted by his confessions, and was sentenced for sixty days, the others for ten months each, to Blackwell's Island.

MEXICO. Protests on a number of matters have been sent from Washington to a number of Mexican presidents, etcetera, during the week, and rumors of a determination to exterminate all foreigners in Mexico City and elsewhere, followed by assurances of a change of heart in the matter, have continued to come over the border, together with news of decisive movements by this and that revolutionary force. Other than these definite facts, there is little to chronicle about the Mexican situation.

CORPORATIONS HAVE NEW MASTER. Under act of Congress President Wilson recently appointed as members of the new Federal Trade Commission, Joseph E. Davies, lawyer; William Harris, fire insurance president; William H. Parry, newspaper editor; George Rublee, lawyer, and Edward Nash Hurley, manufacturer, each at a salary of $10,000, the commission's duties being to formulate rules and regulations for the conduct of corporations doing an interstate business, its almost unlimited powers extending over business and interests having a total capitalization of $20,000,000,000. The commission will have the assistance of a committee from the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, and will begin its work by gathering inside information from industrial corporations.

INSURGENT CHIEFS CAPTURED. The capture of Chief Old Polk and his son Hatch and Chief Posey and his son by General Hugh Scott on March 20 put an end to the Piute uprising in Utah. General Scott has been called the "Great Pacificator." He has dealt with Indians, Spaniards, Cubans, Filipinos and Mexicans. Among the Indians he has met on the battlefield or in parley were Sitting Bull, Red Cloud, Spotted Tail and Geronimo.

FAR END OF PENNSYLVANIA ALSO GETS RELIGION. While eastern Pennsylvania exhibits one symptom of "getting religion" the western end displays another, the Allegheny Presbytery of the United Presbyterian Church in convention at Pittsburgh ruling that every pastor of that denomination in that county must be paid a salary of $1,000 at the least, and have a permanent parsonage.

COVETOUSNESS LEADS BELLIGERENT'S CONSUL INTO TROUBLE. Because he hoped to gain for his government something of value in the war by learning secrets about shipments of submarines in parts to Canada, and, it is alleged, bribed an employee of the Seattle Construction and Dry Dock Company accordingly, William Mueller, Imperial German consul at Seattle, and his secretary, B. M. Schultz, were arrested in the consulate March 17 and released under bond. The German embassy at Washington has protested to the State Department that this action was a violation of treaty rights. It is understood that the consul at Seattle, if guilty of the act charged, was trying to prove that submarines are being manufactured in this country for shipment via Canada to England. Secretary Bryan has declared that the construction of submarines for delivery to a belligerent nation during the war would be considered a violation of neutrality. Aside from the unfortunate curiosity of this German consul—why only submarines? Trainloads of cartridges, shiploads of war munitions, destined for belligerent nations during the war, every individual item "constructed" in this country, are being shipped from our ports constantly. Why such bitter enmity toward submarines? Any reader who knows may answer.

EVENTS QUICKLY TOLD. The Twenty-ninth United States Infantry, Colonel John S. Mallory commanding, sailed March 17 to reinforce the garrison at the Panama Canal.—Russia is seeking new trade treaty with United States to take the place of the treaty abrogated January 1, 1914, because of racial discriminations.—Walter Crane, famous English artist and author, died March 15 at London, aged seventy years.—

CHAINED TO SUCCESS. In the Grand Prize automobile race recently run on the Panama-Pacific Exposition grounds, the winner, an Italian by the name of Dario Resta, was saved from defeat, according to the stories of the race, in a romantic manner. Resta was on his honeymoon, and his bride, a sister of an automobilist who was killed in a former Grand Prize race, sitting among the spectators, noted the coming of rain with the certainty of its affecting the track, and by signals managed to warn her husband, as his car made lap after lap, to stop and put on his chains. Resta finally, heeding his wife's frantic motions and stopping to comply with them out of consideration for her feelings, losing his position in the race and courting defeat, but winning out after all because of that precaution.

EASTER JOY

By Kathleen Wheeler Ross

WE MIGHT have known in the winter
That spring would come again;
We might have known that the future
Would bring an end to pain.
But oh, to be sure that the suffering
Is over, and all made clear,
And to feel 'neath the blazing sunshine
That spring is really here!

We might have known through the snowtime
That flowers were underneath;
We might have sensed the Eternal
Knows no such thing as death.
But, oh, the joy of an Easter
After long winter drear,
And to feel by the soul's awakening
That spring is really here!

We might have known mid the darkness
That sorrow with joy is blent,
And that gladness would end in the morning
The night of our discontent.
But, oh, to forget the shadows;
To mock at unfaith and fear!
And to laugh like jubilant children,
Now spring is really here!

AMERICAN MISSIONARIES ATTACKED. Serious disturbances have occurred in Persia, with steadily increasing violence, since the entrance of Turkey into the European War. The Moslems of Persia have bitterly persecuted the native Christians, and massacres have been feared. A despatch from Julfa to an official Russian news bureau says: "The Turkish consul at Urumiah, Mehemed Raghib Bey, at the head of seventy Askaris, recently attacked the American mission at that place, where 15,000 Orthodox Christians had taken refuge. The consul ordered three priests and two deacons to leave the mission, and as they were passing through the streets they were insulted. An American missionary, Mr. Allen, who was also subjected to insults and blows, succeeded in sending to Selmas two messengers to ask for prompt assistance from the Russian troops to save the lives of the Christians, whom the mission was not able to protect." Those who remember the frightful outbreak of Moslem fanaticism in 1896, which resulted in massacres in Armenia and at points along the Persian border, will understand the danger that now threatens the missionaries and their charges. Although the missionaries themselves were spared, in many localities on the Turkish side of the border the mission buildings and colonies were wrecked, looted and put to the torch, while large numbers of defenseless native Christians were killed.

GENERAL CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS DEAD. Charles Francis Adams, grandson of President John Quincy Adams and great-grandson of John Adams, died at Washington on March 20. General Adams has had a successful and distinguished career as soldier, financier, and historian. He was formerly president of the Union Pacific Railroad and was previously chairman of the Board of Arbitration of the Great Trunk Railway. He served in the Union army through the Civil War first as lieutenant of the First Massachusetts Cavalry and later as captain; then as lieutenant colonel and colonel of the Fifth Massachusetts Cavalry. He was made brevet brigadier general on March 13, 1865. General Adams was the author of many noteworthy historical works and also a favorite speaker in political campaigns and on special occasions.

AN OLD FRIEND IN A NEW GUISE. Time was when stages ran hither and yon at the beck of every passenger, their routes being determined by those who paid fares. Even New York remembers the amiable contrivances that ricocheted up and down Fifth Avenue, and after a while were called jitneys instead of stages. Then intervened the eras of the horsecar and the trolley-car, though there has never been any let-up with the Fifth Avenue bus service. And now the stage is coming back in the form of an automobile, and with pardonable audacity, considering its past, hides its identity behind the name jitney. The jitney is any passenger automobile—usually, at present, a third-hand one—that stops to get you and to leave you wherever you say, charging five cents for the service and earning titles the white-heat antagonism of established car lines. The jitney has broken into the peace of several of our cities, and with financial success that a special jitney type of automobile may soon make its appearance in the catalogues.

THE WORLD'S GREATEST FIGHTING MACHINE In both size and gun-power, the super-dreadnought Pennsylvania, which was launched at Newport News, Va., on March 16, the largest warship in the world, and the most powerful. Britain's biggest dreadnought, the Queen Elizabeth, which is now outbarring the Dardanelles, is one-third smaller in her battering ram and three thousand tons less in size than our new warship. The five largest Japanese warships are all of considerably less tonnage, although they may excel the Pennsylvania somewhat in speed. Her tonnage is 31,400, while that of the Nevada of the Oklahoma and the Queen Elizabeth is 30,500 each. The Pennsylvania's main battery has guns which fire a united broadside of seven and one-half tons of steel, while her secondary batteries have 22 five-inch guns. She has also four 21-inch torpedo tubes. Her officers and crew total 1,002 men. When ready to go into commission, she will have cost $13,000,000.

SUPERDREADNOUGHT PENNSYLVANIA IS LAUNCHED

THE total of $134,731.47, contributed up to noon of March 17 for the relief of the widows and orphans of the Europe, $93,000 has been forwarded to our committees, as already in the Christian Herald, and employed according to the judgment of those in charge in respective countries. We print a letter from the chairman of the committee in England, and will show his with reports from other when received.

For remittances will be made as we are satisfied where to employ the funds, and we hope to have committees at work in Poland and Galicia soon. Through a letter we have received a letter from Zbaraz, Galicia, January 5, which reads as follows:

It is not to be doubted that the distress throughout this general section of the country equals, if, indeed, it does not pass, that of Belgium. We shall be glad to be able to report that our readers' bounty is being used to alleviate the suffering in that far-distant section of the war.

LONDON, March 3.

Earl Grey, formerly governor general of Canada, stands in the front rank of empire-builders and diplomats; Sir Robert Perks (chairman) is one of the leading laymen of the Methodist Church in Great Britain. These represent the English side of the committee, the American members being the Duchess of Marlborough, Mr. H. Gordon Selfridge and Dr. A. C. Dixon, honorary secretary.

All cases are passed on by this committee before help is afforded, and help is given immediately when the facts have been ascertained to justify it. Already some fifty or sixty persons are receiving weekly allowances to tide

Some of the cases are peculiarly pathetic. One poor widow, 21 years of age, has two children, the younger born three or four months after the father was killed in the war. A few weeks before her confinement, her mother died, which plunged her into fresh sorrow and compelled her to live awhile with another relative too poor to keep her. She received a very small War Office grant. When her strength is recovered, she will return to work to maintain her children, and her former employers will probably take her back. Meanwhile a grant from the committee of $2.40 a week is carrying her over.

ANOTHER sad case is that of a young widow who had been married only eleven months, the marriage being deferred until the man had completed his fifteen years' service in the navy. He was called up as a reservist on the outbreak of the war, and was among those who went to a watery grave in the North Sea when H. M. S. Cressy was lost. This lonely young woman, quite unfit, on account of severe illness, to earn her own living, receives a state pension which is insufficient to maintain her, and this has now been supplemented for a while by a grant from the Christian Herald fund.

A moving spectacle is presented by a group of seven children received through the instrumentality of the Christian Herald fund into the National Children's Homes. These seven little things—the ages of six of whom average about eight years, the youngest of the seven being a baby of two weeks—are the children of soldiers, and their fathers have in several cases been killed in the war. Two of them, however, are the little daughters of an army reservist, a widower, suddenly called to rejoin his regiment and go to the front, and having to leave behind seven children, all under eleven years of age. He was at his wits' end to know what to do for his motherless bairns, not all of whom could be provided for at a moment's notice. Here the fund stepped in and made provision for two little girls.

In each of the seven cases alluded to a sum of $50 has been paid as an admission fee to the National Children's Homes, one of the largest (with 2,200 inmates) and most excellent institutions of the kind in Great Britain, founded by the late Rev. Dr. Stephenson, and having branches in Canada. Now, for the modest sum of $50 apiece, these children are introduced into a position which secures them for life. In the Homes they will be fed, clothed and educated until of an age to earn their own livelihood, and then carefully placed out into useful and profitable situations, for which they have been trained. It is a small expenditure, the influence of which will last for sixty or seventy years, and have an effect upon future generations.

These are samples only, and they represent a genuine need, and a response to that need for which the committee and the English Christian folk who know the work are profoundly grateful. Each week other cases are coming to light, some of the most needy having to be sought for, such is the reserve and modesty of many of those in the direst distress.

Wash Day Dont's and Wash Day Do's

Don't boil or scald clothes; don't hard-rub them. Boiling and rough rubbing wear out fabrics much faster than actual use.

Don't waste fuel, time, strength, health, by doing your washing the old-fashioned way. There is an easier, quicker, better way—the Fels-Naptha way.

Do this the next time you wash: Let Fels-Naptha Soap, soak the clothes in cool or lukewarm water for about thirty minutes after breakfast. Rub lightly, rinse, wring and hang out.

All the afternoon is left—you can sew, read, or go visiting—you'll not be too tired even to iron.

Changes a whole day's hard drudgery into a half day's easy work—because Fels-Naptha does the hard part of the washing for you.

Fels-Naptha Soap is just as wonderful for all soap and water housework as it is for washing clothes.

DAVID ANOINTED KING

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR APRIL 11.
I SAM. 16

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Man looketh on the outward appearance, but Jehovah looketh on the heart." I Sam. 16: 7.

We were talking, the other day, my friend and I, about biographies, and I said: "I don't care for these shop-window biographies which put all the best and most attractive goods to the front, and say nothing of the failures, the soiled and waste." We like to know of the motives that actuated men, their ideals and aims, their failures to attain, their consciousness of sin, their rapture in the presence of God, the dizziness with which they looked back on the edge of the precipice over which they had almost gone. That is why the Confessions of St. Augustine, the Memoirs of Brainerd, or Bunyan's Grace Abounding have been of such inestimable value in our Christian library. But after all, what a comfort it is that the Eye which has seen our down-sitting and our uprising, and has known our thoughts before they were born in act, is God. Who could endure to have the secrets of his heart unbared to any other? Hence the exquisite fitness of those two contiguous texts! The one, "The Word of God is quick and powerful, . . . the discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart"; the other, "We have not a high priest that cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities. Let us therefore draw near with boldness unto the throne of grace."

Enter David

By Arthur H. Howland

SUMMER before last you took a delightful trip to a charming spot. Last summer you went back to it, and it seemed more charming than ever. You noticed things about it you had not seen the other time. You felt that the first summer you scarcely began to realize how lovely it was. You may go back this summer and have the same experience. The place will look familiar, yet different. The old charms will be there, but you will see them with new eyes and a mind hungry for rest.

So we go back again and again to the characters of the old Book, and every time find something new and fresh, some point of interest and meaning that we had not seen before. And here we are, studying David again.

David is almost the most lovable character of the Old Testament. He was such a brave, charming boy, tending his father's sheep, playing the harp and singing as he watched them, killing the lion and the bear when they came to attack his charges; having the strange visit recorded in our lesson today, and finding himself set apart to be king of Israel; going to the camp of Israel's armies and slaying Israel's arch-enemy; then taking his place in the king's palace, loving the king's son, faithful to the king, trying to forget the promise made that he himself should one day be king; later, a man now, fleeing from the angered king, pining for water from the old Bethlehem well; mourning when Saul and Jonathan fell in battle with the Philistines; receiving the crown; longing to build a temple for God; sinning his grievous sin; repenting in anguish; exiled by his treasonable son; mourning with a broken heart when his son is killed; singing all his life through the praises of God, the delights of his love; writing the world's great penitential hymn and telling thereafter the richness of repentance.

We are to have eleven lessons about David. All the boys whose names are David will be particularly interested. But every boy and girl, man and woman may get something beautiful and helpful for their own lives by studying his. As the centuries pass we forget his wars and his sin—and see the earnest boy and man, with his heart full of music and affection and worship, preparing the way for the coming of the Messiah and pointing the souls of men to the love of God.

The Light on the Lace

By Amos R. Wells

NO wonder Samuel mourned over Saul's downfall; it seemed to mean the destruction of Samuel's hopes for the people for whom he had given his life. And yet Samuel's peace should have been drawn from a deeper source than no evil of man could mar. On the Western prairies one can see now and then a derrick that tells of a fruitless search for water. A thousand feet the prospector may have bored, till money and patience gave out; no life-giving, fortune-giving water rewarded his toil. But the Christian can sink a well anywhere, however shallow, and he strikes the water of life, clear, pure, satisfying. It flows from the eternal hills; it is never-failing, and no surface currents muddy it. Samuel knew that constant supply of peace and joy, but he seems to have forgotten it.

It is strange to find Samuel timid about visiting Jesse to choose another king. He would appear to have learned long before what Whittier sings: "Simple duty hath no place for fear." The most delicate Brussels lace is—or, alas! was—woven by a single spinner alone in a darkened room, through whose window a narrow shaft of light fell upon the piece he was weaving. Thus, in the weaving of life, it is best done when the weaver sits in the dark, and only his task is in the light. A step at a time, and all the rest mysterious—that was best for Samuel and it is best for us.

The men of Bethlehem were as timid as Samuel, and with equal groundlessness. What is more foolish than fear? An Eastern pilgrim met the Plague. "Where are you going?" he asked. "To Bagdad," replied the Plague, "to kill five thousand people." A few days later the pilgrim met the Plague returning and took him to task: "You said you were going to kill five thousand people, but you killed fifty thousand." "No," said the Plague; "I killed only five thousand, as I said I would; the others died of fright."

Samuel made another mistake, in judging of Jesse's boys. He thought God would choose the tallest and strongest, as Saul had been chosen. He should have learned by that time the deceitfulness of appearances. Once a girl was grieving because she was the ugliest and stupidest in a class of very attractive girls. Her teacher gave her a coarse, wrinkled bulb. "That is you," she said; "plant it and take care of it." The plant grew into a lovely Japanese lily, fit emblem of the lovely woman that the young girl became.

What a fine saying is that of verse 7: "The Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart!" Once an old weaver, at work on a costly fabric, dropped a reel of his silk into a pot of dye. The stain was unnoticeable, and he went on with his work. When finished, the piece was greatly admired, till his employer, holding it up to the light, cried out in dismay. The flaw was instantly visible as a dark, ugly stain. Thus our characters, though admired by men, show too their hidden flaws when held up in the divine light.

It is most significant that David was chosen for the throne when he was at work. Thus Christ chose his disciples. Thus our Lord himself came from the carpenter's shop. Thus Amos was drawn from the farm, and Elisha also. David tended sheep, as did Jacob and Moses. Saul was anointed

ACME-IZE The Old Family Faithfuls

IN every home there are pieces of good furniture that have paid for themselves over and over by faithful service and are still good for years to come.

In some homes these old pieces, because of a shabbiness that comes from lack of occasional refinishing, are gradually shifted about till they land in the attic or storeroom or are sold for junk. If you have any of these old family faithfuls, don't sacrifice them. See what wonderful transformations you can work on them with

The refrigerator that has become a reasonable excuse for a new one may have years of usefulness in it. A couple of coats of Acme Quality White Enamel inside and out will make it beautiful to look at and sweet and sanitary inside.

That old bureau or chest of drawers can be easily and inexpensively refinished. There are dozens of useful old things that a little Acme Quality Varnish or Enamel or Paint or Stain will make good as new.

We have two books—"Acme Quality Painting Guide" and "Home Decorating"—that tell just what Acme Quality Finish to use for each and every surface. They tell how to use the Acme Quality Finishes, what brushes you need, and are full of practical, sensible knowledge and help.

Write for these books and learn how you can get gratifying results by using Acme Quality Finishes. A postal will bring them, together with the name of the nearest Acme dealer.

"Republics give uninterrupted mileage under all road conditions"

—says Old Man Mileage

On dry, rough, gritty country, highways Republic Staggard Tread Tires speed along in smooth-running harmony with the road. On smooth, wet city streets the long, tough studs of the Republic Staggard Tread grip with bull-dog tenacity, hold the wheels true to their course, minimize the danger of skidding and slipping.

Uninterrupted mileage—continuous service—safety—that is what counts in motoring.

Republic Tires and Tubes are the first choice of thousands of motorists who look for these things—of men who think thousands of miles ahead when they buy tires. They have learned that Republics are quality tires, built as nearly trouble-proof as human ingenuity knows how.

as he was seeking his father's asses. The true worker is already a king.

We are glad when we see the anointing oil on the forehead of the young David, but we are sobered when we think of the long years of danger and difficulty before him. It was much like the experience of the great French painter Millet, who was a farmer's son, as David was a shepherd's. Millet, having in mind his boyhood, tenderly painted his wonderful "Angelus." He took it to Paris and hawked it about, but no one would have it. At last the Belgian minister gave him $360 for it. Six years after Millet's death the picture sold for $32,000, and in 1889 James F. Sutton, president of the American Art Association, bought it for $116,000.

Yes, the Davids are long, often, in coming to their own among worldlings and in worldly matters; but from birth the Christ of the Most High is upon them. In the eyes of God they are anointed in boyhood, and through all the long struggles toward the belated recognition of their fellows. Well for them if, like David, they do not live for human recognition, but are well content with the approval of their God.

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

"HORNS of Oil." Horns of cattle were used for bottles long before the invention of glass. The larger end was closed by wood or metal and the smaller end by a movable plug or other form of stopper. These horns were frequently adorned by polishing, carving and most elaborate fittings of silver and gold. Horns are most frequent in Syria today for carrying gunpowder and are prized because of their work and damp-proof quality and convenience in holding the old-fashioned muzzle-loader guns.

Bethlehem—House of bread. This is the assured mention of this place in Bible history. It stands five miles south of Jerusalem, birthplace of David, the birthplace of Christ. Its inhabitants are wholly Christian. Church of the Nativity is perhaps the oldest Christian church in existence. Its people, men and women, wear a peculiar costume recognizable all over Syria. The Bethlehemites still a fine looking race compared with the people of all the other towns within many miles.

Harp. A stringed instrument whose exact shape is unknown. The modern "oud" is much like a mandolin. The Bedawy emir, mentioned last week, kept a man about his tent to the praises of his guests. When Dr. Mary Lay visited his encampment this poet and musician was assigned to her, the honored guest, and sat and sang in front of her tent night after night. At other times he served to keep the traditions of the tribe and repeat the tales of valor and adventure so dear to the Bedawys.

The people of Syria well understand the power of music to soothe and restore the memory of a troubled mind. While the native music is essentially different from that of Europe they are not insensible to our modern hymns and songs. A Druze judge visited our home not many days ago and after listening to some Christian hymns played by a violinist he pressed him to say how it affected him. Dr. Lay touched he sat for a moment in silence and then said that it made him feel merciful and would lead him to lighten sentence upon a transgressor.

"Elders of the town." Older men or heads of families. In a patriarchal system of government these are the natural authorities. Bethlehem still has its "elders" who meet a distinguished guest at the borders of the town and who perform somewhat similar duties to those which fell to them in Samuel's day. The elders are in every case the most trustworthy and substantial men of the community. "He to meet him trembling." Samuel's visits are often made in his official capacity to rebuke and to correct abuses, hence their alarm in sacrifice was a peaceful errand.

Conducted by Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

I AM asked to take the superintendency of a school in a community to which I have just moved. I am asked to make a survey of the school and adopt my own plans and methods to bring the work to highest efficiency. What course would you pursue? Do you know of any persons who have performed similar service for schools?

A. Miss Lemert of Kansas City for some years has been employed by the Sunday School Board of the Christian Church as a Sunday school efficiency expert. She usually goes to a community, to one or more schools in that place, and inaugurates an efficiency campaign to increase the teaching force through a teacher-training class and build up the weak departments and strengthen the spiritual power of the school. She stays from one week to several months according to need. She is usually engaged several years in advance so great is the demand for her services. She can be reached in care of the Standard Publishing Company, Cincinnati. The Methodist Board of Sunday Schools, 1018 Wabash Avenue, Chicago, has now several Sunday school specialists employed to build up schools. You can doubtless learn the plans by writing to them.

In Detroit Mr. Eugene C. Foster carried out a plan of taking to the Sunday schools of the city in succession several of the Sunday school workers of the county to show the school how to build up. First a survey of the school was made to discover the points of need. Then from four to six o'clock on the day appointed an elementary worker would meet with the Cradle Roll, Beginners', Primary and Junior teachers to show plans for efficient work for these departments. At six o'clock pastor, officers and all the teachers of that school would meet together for supper and a social time. At seven the boys' and girls' work would be considered; at 7:30 the adult work; at 8:30 teacher training, and the pastor would end with an inspirational talk. Thus over thirty of Detroit's schools were built up.

In taking charge of your school I should certainly make a survey of the school first, ascertain its points of weakness and strength. Then I would make a survey of the community by a house-to-house visitation and find what grip the school has upon the homes. Call the officers and teachers together, give credit for all that is good, show the deficiencies and proceed to build up intensively and then start a campaign for new members and spiritual results. Plan to cover the week-day as well as Sunday needs for your scholars, secure a good officers' and teachers' library, promote teachers' meetings, advertise the school, vary and brighten the exercises, create school atmosphere and loyalty by the contagion of your own spirit.

Q. Can you suggest a course of study for girls' and women's classes?

A. For the senior girls there are several years of graded lessons now published. The Methodist Book Concern, Cincinnati, Ohio, can supply you with samples. The Young Women's Christian Association, 600 Lexington Avenue, New York City, publish for women's classes the following course of systematic Bible study:

Course 1: First year, Jesus the Man of Bethlehem, Elvira J. Slack, 30 cents; second year, life of St. Paul, A. G. Leacock, 50 cents; third year, Studies in the Prophets, Margaret Brooks, 25 cents.

Course 2: First year, The Mind of the Messiah, Charlotte H. Adams, 40 cents; second year, Bible Studies in the Book of Acts, W. Oldham, 40 cents; The Epistles of Paul, Edward E. Nourse, 40 cents; third year, Women of Ancient Israel, Charlotte H. Adams, 25 cents; Work and Teachings of the Earlier Prophets, Kent and Smith, 50 cents.

Then there are text-books for special classes such as: Young Working Girls, by Robert A. Woods, 60 cents; Student Standards of Religion, by Harrison L. Elliott and Ethel Cutler, 50 cents.

For special mission courses for women's classes secure Voluntary Bible Prospectus published by the Student Young Women's Christian Association, 600 Lexington Avenue, New York, which contains splendid courses on the Bible, foreign missions and North American missions. Q. How can my class of girls increase their interest in missions?—H. W.

A. Write the Missionary Education Series of your denomination for the books to be recommending for girls of the age of 12 to 15 in your class. Encourage your girls to meet weekly if possible, if not then monthly, at the home of the teacher, or one of the members, and spend an hour to an hour in reading from the book, each girl reading a chapter in turn. After each chapter's reading, ask one of the girls to tell as well as possible the story of that chapter. This will make them listen carefully.

Secure from the Missionary Education Department, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York, plan for acting out a missionary story, the girls to be dressed in the simple costumes of the foreign countries represented and to present customs and work of the countries in an interesting way. Invite the parents and friends when the girls are ready and take up an offering for some special missionary work, such as support of an orphan, or the training of girls to be a Bible woman, etc. You will be surprised at the enthusiasm which the girls will develop for mission work if they have a plan to work for and a plan of work.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

Getting Ready for the Next Life

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topic for April 11. Col. 3: 1-4

WE COME to the application of Easter. It means to die to sin as Christ died to his earth life; it means to rise with him to a new life, a life of holiness here and now; it means to have our minds fixed on heaven's principles and heaven's purposes; it means to try to bring heaven's atmosphere to earth; it means to live so that when Christ comes we shall not be terrified but glad; it means to start now the life we are to live in heaven, so there will be no shock when we pass from this world to that.

A Singer with a Consecrated Voice

Epworth League Topic for April 11.
Ex. 15: 20, 21

TO SING for Jesus—that may be a higher mission than preaching Jesus. Indeed to sing for Jesus is to preach him, for the number of those souls who have been led to Christ by consecrated song is beyond reckoning. If you have a good voice, consecrate it to Christ; let him fill your heart with his love; get the voice trained; take the simple opportunities of singing for Jesus—in prayer meetings, league meetings and Sunday school, while waiting and training for the larger opportunities. Keep sweet; don't be jealous of other singers—it is one of the saddest phases of church work that so many "squabbles" center around the choir. Sing the love of Jesus and lives will be blessed.

Do You Know Your Bible?

Question List No. 3. I Corinthians PART I

IT IS not too late now to enter the Bible Contest for 1915. You still have a good chance of winning a prize. The contest is open to all. Answers must reach the Christian Herald office within two weeks from date of issue in which questions appear. Honor Roll next week.

State Scripture reference with every answer.

1. a. What province and city does Paul mention in the last chapter of I Corinthians, which indicates the place from which the epistle was written? b. What two Christians, who used to reside in Corinth, does he refer to as being with him there? c. What passage in the Acts tells of these friends having gone with Paul from Corinth to this city and having remained there?
2. a. Who brought the news to Paul that all was not well with the church at Corinth? b. What three other visitors from Corinth came to see Paul? c. Whom was he sending back as a messenger?
3. a. What was the principal fault of the Corinthian church? b. The use of what names emphasized this error? c. What verses in Acts state that one of these men had preached and worked in Achaia, specifying Corinth?
4. a. Can men know God through their natural wisdom? b. Does God need wise and strong and honored men or things to carry on his work?
5. a. What did Paul declare was the one subject of his thinking and preaching at Corinth? b. In what was their faith to stand?
6. a. What does the fact of their contentions show as to their spiritual condition? b. In what terms does Paul state that the personality of the leaders through whom one accepts Christ or is first nourished is not a vital matter?
7. Beside the matter of impurity, what other fault does he condemn?
8. a. In what chapter does Paul state his personal opinion that, because of the strenuous nature of Christian work and because he thought the time of Christ's return was near, it would be better for unmarried Christians to remain unmarried? b. Though each Christian is at liberty to decide for himself questions of conduct in non-essentials (such as, in those days, the eating of meat which had been offered to idols), of what must he take care? c. What noble stand does Paul himself take?
9. a. In what chapter does Paul defend his apostleship? b. Why does he disclaim any credit for preaching the Gospel?
10. a. What warning does he give over-confident Christians? b. In what great verse does Paul state that every act of life must come under the religious motive? c. How does he express the fact that he did not seek his own advantage in his work?

"I Drive a Paige"

THERE must be a reason for the prevalence of that sentiment. One reason for it is the ideal of the Paige-Detroit Motor Car Company—to give the maximum of motor car distinction, comfort, service, luxury, economy and efficiency at the minimum price. Another reason is to be found in the impregnable financial position of the Paige Company, its low overhead expense, freedom from bonded indebtedness of any kind and ability to lead indefinitely in the moderate-price field.

And the evidence of the overwhelming popularity of Paige Cars is the fact that to the best of our knowledge, the Paige, in actual bona fide sales, has led every American-made motor car at every Automobile Show held in this country this year.

These are the proofs that Paige leads the world in genuine basic motor car values.

AN EASTER FABLE

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

SOME of us, here in the world, are destined to be flowers in the garden of life—tall lilies, or graceful roses, or modest violets. Some of us, perhaps not a few, may become weeds. No matter what we are, let us try, with God's gracious help, to grow beautifully, lovingly, helpfully!

ONCE upon a time, by some strange chance, a little seed blew into a large conservatory and settled down to sleep on the moist earth. Being tired from its long journey it slept steadily until one day the sun poked a warm finger into the earth and whispered softly:

"Wake up, tiny seed; put your little green arms above the warm blanket and reach to me!"

And the little seed, like a drowsy child on a cold winter morning, stretched its arms and smiled, as that same child would have stretched its arms and smiled to a loving mother. And there, above the brown blanket of earth, two small green shoots appeared and started to grow.

The conservatory was very beautiful, and the little seed caught its breath with wonder and delight as it gazed around for the first time. Masses of glossy green foliage fell away from a small marble fountain and bits of statuary gleamed whitely from behind huge, graceful ferns. Great rose bushes filled the air with fragrance and tall lilies nodded lazily to each other. Bright-faced pansies giggled in a royal purple and yellow group, and clumps of mignonette blossomed shyly together. The little seed breathed a sigh of rapture as it looked, and wondered vaguely how it had ever happened to come to such a beautiful place. It remembered a time of tossing on the wind, a time of being buffeted from one cold window ledge to another; finally a time of sleeping. But this—the little seed gave another deep sigh—this was like heaven!

"I wonder," it murmured, "I wonder what kind of a flower I shall be when I grow up? Perhaps I shall be white and gold like the lilies, or shell-pink like the roses!" It wiggled its little roots in the softness of the earth and stretched its arms higher toward the warm, smiling sun.

The days crept on, a vague number of them (for little seeds cannot be expected to count). There were many visits from a harsh man, who opened windows, and snipped leaves with a wicked-looking pair of scissors, and sprinkled cool water over the earth. He was called "the gardener." There were children who sniffed at the flowers and dabbled their fingers in the clearness of the fountain; and there were young lovers who slipped quietly down the tiny walks and murmured gentle words to the accompaniment of the soft music that filled the rest of the house. The little seed hardly slept for sheer interest.

"I wonder," it questioned one day of a tall lily that towered high above it, "I wonder if I shall ever look like you?"

The lily bent its wonderful head graciously.

"I don't think so!" it said sympathizingly. "You don't seem to grow tall."

For the first time the little seed looked down at its leaves. True, it had not grown tall! Why, it was even growing fat and scrubby. Suddenly, with a fear that gnawed at its heart, it turned to its near neighbor, a pansy. Pansies are not tall.

"Do you think," it asked, with a note of desperation in its voice, "do you think that I shall grow to look like you?"

The pansy shook its head—shook it cheerfully.

"Never!" it murmured—"why, our leaves are different." Suddenly it jumped. "Keep quiet," came a whisper; "the gardener!" (Flowers never talk when folk can hear.)

The little seed always shivered instinctively when the gardener passed. It gasped, now, in abject terror, the man paused in front of it.

"A weed!" he was saying contentedly; "a weed! How did it get my garden?" All at once his rough fingers plucked the little seed from its warm bed and flung it, small and quivering, on a wheelbarrow. "A weed!" muttered the gardener, passed down the tiny walk.

The little seed lay dazed, to all outward appearance, as it was bundled from the conservatory. It felt as the captive emperors felt when they were being dragged through Rome at the chariot wheels. It was thrown carelessly into a bed on the gutter, its poor little heart seemed to snap. Quite suddenly it hated the other plants that were flowers, the gardener, the sun, the warm brown earth.

"I might have been a lily, it sobbed, "and I'm only a weed. I must die—I will die—the world is cold and I hate it!"

MARY ELLEN was coming home from the mission school. The kind Lady had been talking about flowers, and Mary Ellen's little heart was sad. She lived alone on the top floor of a tenement house with the Busy Mother, and she knew that there would never be time for a garden or money for a plant. Still, the people died hard, for Mary Ellen had faith in miracles, and she prayed as she walked home from the mission school.

"O God, send me a garden!" prayed Mary Ellen.

She was passing a barrel at the time. Her keen eyes caught a shimmer of green in the depths of it—drooping, fading green. It was the little seed, and the little seed was praying, too.

"Oh, let me die!" the little seed was saying.

Mary Ellen poked experimental fingers into the barrel. Tender little hands brought the bit of greenness to light. She surveyed it curiously—its healthy roots, its drooping little leaves that were trying to die. Mary Ellen was a polite child—let teach one to be polite at the mission school.

"Thank you, God!" said Mary Ellen.

It was a triumphant entry that the little seed made into the small tenement room. The Busy Mother laid down her sewing and found a secret to hold the visitor, and Mary Ellen searched the whole place for a spot of sunlight to stand it in. "My garden," she cooed.

The little seed drooped in its secret. It remembered the fountain, the sunlight, the rich, brown soil of the conservatory.

"I cannot live here!" it cried.

If the little seed had been a flower it probably would have died. It was a weed, and though it moaned and tried to smother its tiny soul, it continued to grow greener, and stronger, and more scrubby. The Busy Mother paused often in her work to look at the bravery of it; little Mary Ellen took sparkling stories of "my garden" to the mission school, and the one gala day when she came home at night she screamed with delight to see a tight green bud on the plant.

"Mother! mother!" she cried, "see—a flower."

For the first time since it had left the conservatory the little seed felt proud. After all, it was something to be loved—after all it was something to bear flowers for a Mary Ellen.

"I wonder what I am?" murmured the little seed.

The next day at mission school the kind Lady told about Easter Sunday. She gathered the children, the little aliens, about her and told them

Protection for the Home

Husband: I forgot to tell you that I took out another policy yesterday.
Wife: What—another? I thought you were going to wait till next year.
Husband: Yes, dear, but it costs less now, and besides—next year may never come.

He was right. For him "Next Year" never came. He took "the long trip," but left his home protected.

Men like that make the Nation great and there are thousands of them in every State.

The strongest desire of husband and wife is the welfare of their children. The husband works hard to provide for them and would be glad to know how best to safeguard them.

The wife works hard too—in the home—and is equally interested with her husband in sound insurance-protection at low net cost such as that offered by the Postal Life Insurance Company—the Company of Safety, Service and Saving.

Safety

The Postal Life issues all standard legal-reserve policy-forms; it is under the strict supervision of the New York State Insurance Department; it maintains the full reserves required by law, now $9,000,000; also a special deposit of $100,000 with the State of New York and ample funds in leading banks.

The Postal, now in its tenth year, has $44,000,000 of insurance in force.

Service

As an aid in safeguarding the health of policyholders the Company maintains a Health Bureau, distributes periodical Health Bulletins, and provides one free medical examination a year for each policyholder if desired.

Saving

The Postal Life employs no agents and maintains no branch offices, but receives business from applicants wherever they may live, thus making decisive savings for its policyholders.

the story of a wonderful Life that began in a stable and ended on a cross. She told them the way her church up-town celebrated the day with anthems and white-robed choir boys and lilies. She told how, afterwards, the flowers were sent to sick children.

"We give them in His name," she finished; "in His name! Because," her eyes glanced far away, "because he gave his life for us!"

Mary Ellen was listening. "We give because"—she asked breathlessly. "Lady, did he give his life—for me?"

"For you, Mary Ellen!"

Mary Ellen walked home slowly. The Busy Mother greeted her with a smile that was less tired than usual.

"See, dear," said the Busy Mother, "your flower has bloomed. I used to pick them when I was a tiny girl. We called them dandelions!"

Mary Ellen walked softly over to the flower. One small finger caressed the golden yellow blossom.

"It's my dearest thing—next to you!" she said softly—"should I give it, mother?"

The Busy Mother laid down her work. There in the dim little room the blossom made a splash of sunlight color amid the dulness.

"Give it?" she questioned—"give it—where?"

Mary Ellen looked at her garden. Then she looked at the Busy Mother who had again bent over her sewing.

"It's going to be Easter Sunday," she said, "and Jesus gave his life for me. I want to give something to him!" Suddenly she sobbed. "It's my garden," she choked, "but I want to give it. It's—" she buried her head on the Busy Mother's shoulder and told about the church and the flowers.

The Busy Mother patted Mary Ellen's small, tired head, and winked back her own tears, but over in the corner the little seed drooped its blossom with shame. Why, lilies went to church on Easter—not weeds!

The next morning when Mary Ellen arrived at the mission she handed a newspaper-wrapped, queerly-shaped bundle to the Kind Lady.

"It's for Him"—said Mary Ellen. "Him?" The Kind Lady was not thinking of the Easter story—"him? What is it, dear?"

Mary Ellen choked back a sob. "He died—for me—" she told the Kind Lady, "and I want to give him my dearest thing. Will you take it to your church?"

The Kind Lady's brow cleared. Softly, with tender fingers, she undid the clumsy wrappings, the bulky newspaper. In all its brightness the little seed glowed at her—

"My garden!" breathed Mary Ellen.

The Kind Lady's eyes were moist as she looked at the child's gift. She thought of the flower committee's astonishment when they saw the dandelion, and she made up her mind that it should have a place of honor. Suddenly she drew the little girl into her arms.

"Your garden shall go to church, dear," she said, "and He, Himself, will watch it as it grows!"

THE church was wonderful—just as the conservatory had been wonderful. Masses of white lilies and green ferns breathed of love, and springtime, and resurrection. At first the little seed, in the shadow of a tall plant, was rather frightened and ashamed. It shivered with nervousness, and then—

All at once a breath of something stole through the huge room—something sweeter than the perfume of the lilies, sweeter and infinitely thrilling—it was music.

Unexplainably, with the music a light of understanding crept over the little seed. It realized that, even though it was only a weed, there was a place for it in the world. It realized that a weed may be beautiful and useful. Its little golden face made a spot of color against the green—color that looked like the rays of the sun. When the music stopped the little seed sighed and breathed a prayer—to live! It had found itself.

UNIVERSAL BIBLE HOUSE, 472 Winston Bldg., Philadelphia

WITH a physical map of the world before us the demand of Japan that China shall give her an important place in her national councils appears as absurd as if Cuba were to make a similar demand upon the United States. But a physical map of the world conveys nothing as regards the situation that has suddenly developed between Japan and China, excepting the tremendous disparity in the size of the two countries. China proper, with Manchuria and all the outlying countries under her government, has about four and a quarter million square miles of territory; Japan, with all her dependencies, has about a quarter of one million square miles. The population of China is vastly in excess of 325,000,000; that of Japan is under 70,000,000. But mere size has little to do with the things that are happening in that section of the world.

In an interview with an American who has had unusual opportunities to study at first hand China and her relations with her ambitious neighbor, we have gathered some interesting sidelights on this subject. These are rather fragmentary and detached items, and by no means determine what is Japan's motive or object, nor what the future will bring forth. But they will help somewhat in understanding what Japan has already done.

It has been reported in the Christian Herald that Japan recently made twenty-one demands upon China, which on their face were startling, inasmuch as they seemed tantamount to claiming the right on the part of the Japanese to participate in the government of China; a claim apparently without any other ground than a wish to enjoy such participation. So far as the outside world is aware, nothing has occurred in the history of these two nations, or in their diplomatic intercourse or their trade relations, the natural outcome of which would be such a move on the part of Japan. Japan, however, is said to feel that because she stopped Russian aggression in China, China owes her something.

THE explanation that seems to fit is that Japan is rapidly outgrowing her territory, and having always considered China as the natural field for her expansion, and knowing China's total inferiority in military and naval strength, and realizing that the pressing engagements elsewhere of the nations of Europe give her a free hand in dealing with China, Japan inserted an opening wedge by seizing the German colony of Kiauchau on the pretext of assisting an ally under attack (England), and at precisely the psychological moment now seeks to follow the wedge into Chinese affairs.

It will be remembered that Japan resented the activities of the Chinese in Korea years ago—the present president of China, Yuan Shi Kai, then representing his emperor in Korea—and failing to obtain what she felt were her rights in that country, stepped across with an army and drove out the Chinese, winning the everlasting antipathy of Yuan Shi Kai. The expansion of Russian influence in Manchuria excited similar distrust on the part of Japan, and the Russo-Japanese war resulted, Russia being expelled from Manchuria.

It is commonly understood in China that Japanese capital financed the second revolution in China, the revolution that was aimed at the overthrow of Yuan Shi Kai; and that in return Japan was to have been given Manchuria had the revolution succeeded, which it did not. Huang Hsing, who was second only to Dr. Sun Yat Sen in that second revolution, is said to be in the United States at the present time sowing seeds of a third revolution among the Chinese of this country. If this is a fact, it is interesting in view of the sudden determination on the part of Japan to claim a place in the affairs of China.

The vast population of China is not united in support of the present government. It is said that it would be impossible for Yuan Shi Kai to command the financial support of the great wealthy classes in the south of China in the event of a third revolution. With the government unable, presumably, to maintain itself against a national uprising, what effective defense can be expected in the event of an aggressive move by Japan having at least the moral support of those Chinese who connived at the revolution that failed?

Looking across the sea to China, Japan sees there limitless opportunities for expansion, and realizes that her nearest and greatest market may be lost to her if she does not succeed in gaining such a place in the administration of that country as shall enable her to dictate China's policy toward other countries. In return, and equally in self-preservation, Japan will doubtless be prepared to preserve China from any "division" by the powers of Europe after the war.

China, of course, is slow to welcome such violent wooing. That vast and ancient land does not understand why it should pass under the protectorate of Japan merely because Japan sees that sort of an arrangement. China does not require it for herself. She is working out her destiny as every other nation is supposed to be free to do. Her land and her coasts, her ports and her resources, her history and her people have not, in the opinion of China, been in preparation all the centuries for Japanese conquest in 19

ONE indication of the feeling on the part of the Chinese is in an appeal addressed to President Wilson the Chinese Y. M. C. A. of Washington, William W. Chung, president, which in part reads as follows:

For three years and a half China has struggled through an internal revolution and is now beginning to reap the benefits of a republican form of government. Her sons and daughters have only begun to realize what patriotism means, and her government has begun to develop her vast natural resources. Just at this time, when her every energy should be devoted to building up a strong and stable government, and at the psychological moment when the attention of all the world is also directed in the awful European conflict, the government of Japan has seized the opportunity to make twenty-one drastic and far-reaching demands upon China which, if acceded to, will mean absolute absorption of our country by Japan, and will precipitate, inevitably, a war between the two countries. Should China have to yield to these demands, the death knell to her freedom will have rung, she will pass into a state of subjection, but in the process the blood of the flower of her young manhood will flow in rivulets throughout her land as flows the blood of the young manhood of Europe today! To prevent this great wrong to China, to prevent a war which must follow if Japan presses her unrighteous demands, we appeal to you and to the Christian people of this great country to give us at least your moral support.

The opinion was expressed in the interview referred to above that a stand taken by the United States in behalf of the integrity of China would very probably terminate Japan's present aspirations.

CHINA approached the powers, including the United States, upon the subject, making known the demands of Japan, and the Administration at Washington has made a diplomatic protest to Japan, on the ground that some of the demands contravene existing treaties between this country and China. Russia, England and France also have opposed objections, and while the exact status of affairs is not made public, it is understood that Japan has taken some steps looking to an armed enforcement of her requirements. It does not appear likely, however, that in the face of positive objections raised by the United States and other nations Japan will persist in her program at present.

day in the bulletins, an American correspondent of reputation, Herbert Corey, telegraphing from the German headquarters on this western battle-line, under date of March 16, states that he had watched that day a battle on the five-mile front, from Perthes to Hila, in Champagne, and asserts that this battle was fought over the bodies of 25,000 French dead, and that on this line, short as it is, more than 50,000 French have been killed since February 4.

Though it has been known that the fighting at this point was extremely murderous, no one has thought that the dead were anything like so numerous. For obvious reasons, considering from whence this despatch was sent, Mr. Corey gives no figures regarding the German casualties.

How the deadlock on this front is going to be broken becomes more and more of a puzzle. Direct frontal attacks seem absolutely out of the question, as the Neuve Chapelle battle proves. Even though there was a two-mile gain, it cost the victors some 18,000 men. The French offensive at Champagne has not gained very much, and that little at even a more extensive loss in men, and men in such numbers neither side can afford to lose.

On the extreme western end of the line, near Dixmude, the Belgians are said to have advanced a little along the river Yser. In the Argonne and around Verdun matters have apparently been very quiet, for those storm-centers. In Alsace and Lorraine affairs were very quiet. Appearances may, however, be deceptive, as it is clearly apparent that both sides are concealing their movements as much as possible and allowing little news to reach the outside world.

[Later details of the fighting in the Dardanelles state that the battleships Bouvet, Irresistible and Ocean were blown up by floating mines while engaged with the remainder of the allied fleet in attacking the forts in the narrows of the Dardanelles on Thursday, March 18. The crews of the two British ships were virtually all saved, having been transferred to other ships under a hot fire, but an internal explosion took place on board the Bouvet after she had fouled the mine and most of her men—621 officers and crew—were lost. The Bouvet sank in thirty-six fathoms within three minutes of the time that she hit the mine. The Irresistible sank at 5.50 P.M. and the Ocean at 6.05 P.M.

The waters in which the ships were lost had been swept of mines, but the British Admiralty asserts that floating containers of explosives were set adrift, and were carried down by the current toward the allied ships gathered inside the entrance of the straits.

All the ships that were sunk were old ones, the Bouvet having been completed nearly twenty years ago and the Ocean and the Irresistible in 1898. They were very useful, however, for the work in which they were engaged in the Dardanelles. The sunken British ships are being replaced by the battleships Queen and Implacable, vessels of a similar type.]

Little Sir Galahad

"The Book With a Blessing"

By Phoebe Gray

FOR MEN AND WOMEN AND FOR BOYS AND GIRLS

The book that captivates whole families by its joyous humor, its tender appeal, its dramatic and gripping situations, and its wonderful spiritual quality. No one can meet Charlie Thomas (the "Little Sir Galahad" of the story) and fail to love him, to live with him, to be uplifted and helped by knowing him. For young and old, for all kinds of people, it is indeed "The Book with a Blessing."

Fathers and mothers are putting it in the hands of growing boys and girls to read, and are reading it aloud to the younger children.

Clergymen are preaching from it and about it—recommending it as a powerful influence for good!

Read These Endorsements

"Too much cannot be said in praise of 'Little Sir Galahad.' I shall take great pleasure in recommending it to the members of the Massachusetts W. C. T. U."—MRS. KATHARINE LENT STEVENSON, President.

"I have read the book, 'Little Sir Galahad,' by Phoebe Gray, with much interest. The chapter, 'The Bestest Christmas,' I used on my junior congregation on Christmas Sunday."—REV. WILLIAM VAN DERVEER BERG, Pastor, Central Congregational Church, Philadelphia.

"All members of our family, even our six-year-old boy, have appreciated the story and will gladly recommend it to our friends. South Church Parsonage occupants have listened to the story as read aloud, and overflowing sympathies were expressed."—REV. NOYES O. BARTHOLOMEW, Pastor, South Congregational Church, Rochester, N. Y.

"I have read 'Little Sir Galahad' with keen interest. Our children have devoured it, waiting eagerly for their turn at the book. It has a wholesome, knightly flavor, a noble motive, and arouses necessary questions about the greatest evil of our times, the drink traffic. 'Little Sir Galahad' will take his place as one of the classic pictures of a soul heroic against tremendous odds. Every home should read this book with a blessing."—REV. ERNEST BOURNER ALLEN, Pastor, Washington Street Congregational Church, Toledo, Ohio.

LITTLE SIR GALAHAD is the story of a little invalid boy who by his serenity and triumphant faith not only finds his way to robust young manhood but casts about him a beautiful influence for good; it is the love story of a winsome, plucky girl and the chivalrous but over-indulged son of a millionaire; it is the story of a man redeemed from the degradation of intemperance and of a brilliant financier who awakens to his own shortcomings and makes a tremendous sacrifice to help meet the greatest need ever known in the history of the world. Here is a wealth of humor, pathos, romance, of rare and wholesome entertainment skilfully blended with a great moral lesson.

This is the book about which thirty-seven Boston Ministers preached on Sunday, February 28, twenty in Chicago, March 7, and many others in Baltimore, Philadelphia, and other leading cities. Why did they do so? Read and you will see why!

"The author understands people, knows what we ordinary folks are. You feel that you are one with beings of this planet, of this vicinity, of your own town."—Boston Post.

"Nothing finer than he has ever appeared in fiction. His faith is glorious and his real appreciation of what it meant to be a Galahad Knight most touching. He saw that the Holy Grail is still to be sought in this world and still to be achieved and that it is exemplified in noble purpose and right living. The story sets forth the very essence of faith in God, love of men and sound living."—Wilmington Every Evening.

An Old Man at Fifty —A Young Man at Seventy

The Remarkable Story of Sanford Bennett, a San Francisco Business Man, Who Has Solved the Problem of Prolonging Youth

By C. E. WILLIAMS

THERE is no longer any occasion to go hunting for the Spring of Eternal Youth. What Ponce de Leon failed to discover in his world-famous mission, ages ago, has been brought to light right here in staid, prosaic America, by Sanford Bennett, a San Francisco business man. He can prove it, too, right in his own person.

At 50 he was partially bald. Today he has a thick head of hair, although it is white. At 50 his eyes were weak. Today they are as strong as when he was a child. At 50 he was a worn-out, broken-down old man. Today he is in perfect health, a good deal of an athlete and as young as the average man of 35.

All this he has accomplished by some very simple and gentle exercises which he practises for about ten minutes before arising in the morning. Yes, the exercises are taken in bed, peculiar as this may seem.

As Mr. Bennett explains, his case was not one of preserving good health, but one of rejuvenating a weak middle-aged body into a robust old one, and he says what he has accomplished anyone can accomplish by the application of the same methods, whether they be young or old—male or female—and so it would seem. All of which puts the Dr. Osler theory to shame.

I haven't room in this article to go into a lengthy description of Mr. Bennett's methods for the restoration of youth and the prevention of old age. All of this he tells himself in a book which he has written, entitled "Old Age—Its Cause and Prevention." This book is a complete history of himself and his experiences, and contains complete instructions for those who wish to put his health and youth-building methods to their own use. It is a wonderful book. It is a book that every man and woman who is desirous of remaining young after passing the fiftieth, sixtieth, seventieth, and, as Mr. Bennett firmly believes, the one hundredth milestone of life, should read.

For the purpose of spreading broadcast the methods of promoting health and longevity developed by Mr. Bennett, an interesting eight-page booklet, which is in effect a summary of his system, has been prepared by the publishers of Mr. Bennett's interesting book—the Physical Culture Publishing Company, 3903 Flatiron Building, New York City.

This booklet they will send free to anyone sufficiently interested to write for it.)

The grandest thing in the world is Youth, and it is one of the really great hardships of life that "its beauteous morn" should pass so swiftly and give place to old age.

For having solved the problem of prolonging youth during life, the world owes Sanford Bennett a vote of thanks. Of course there are those who will scoff at the idea, but the real wise men and women among those who hear of Sanford Bennett and his return to youth will most certainly investigate further, and at least acquire a knowledge of his methods.—Advertisement.

Pollyanna, however, was not the person to set her hand to the plow and look back. Besides, there was that three-thousand-dollar prize, or even any of the others, if she should not happen to win the first one! Of course even one hundred dollars was something! So day after day she wrote and erased, and rewrote, until finally the story, such as it was, lay completed before her. Then, with some misgivings, it must be confessed, she took the manuscript to Millie Snow to be typewritten.

"It reads all right—that is, it makes sense," mused Pollyanna doubtfully, as she hurried along toward the Snow cottage; "and it's a real nice story about a perfectly lovely girl. But there's something somewhere that isn't quite right about it, I'm afraid. Anyhow, I don't believe I'd better count too much on the first prize; then I won't be too much disappointed when I get one of the littler ones."

Pollyanna always thought of Jimmy when she went to the Snows', for it was at the side of the road near their cottage that she had first seen him as a forlorn little runaway lad from the Orphans' Home years before. She thought of him again today, with a little catch of her breath. Then, with the proud lifting of her head that always came now with the second thought of Jimmy, she hurried up to the Snows' doorstep and rang the bell.

As was usually the case, the Snows had nothing but the warmest of welcomes for Pollyanna; and also as usual it was not long before they were talking of the game: in no home in Beldingsville was the glad game more ardently played than in the Snows'.

"Well, and how are you getting along?" asked Pollyanna, when she had finished the business part of her call.

"Splendidly!" beamed Milly Snow. "This is the third job I've got this week. Oh, Miss Pollyanna, I'm so glad you had me take up typewriting, for you see I can do that right at home! And it's all owing to you."

"Nonsense!" disclaimed Pollyanna, merrily.

"But it is. In the first place, I couldn't have done it anyway if it hadn't been for the game—making mother so much better, you know, that I had some time to myself. And then, at the very first, you suggested typewriting, and helped me to buy a machine. I should like to know if that doesn't come pretty near owing it all to you!"

But once again Pollyanna objected. This time she was interrupted by Mrs. Snow from her wheel-chair by the window. And so earnestly and gravely did Mrs. Snow speak that Pollyanna, in spite of herself, could but hear what she had to say.

"Listen, child, I don't think you know quite what you've done. But I wish you could! There's a little look in your eyes, my dear, today, that I don't like to see there. You are plagued and worried over something, I know. I can see it. And I don't wonder: your uncle's death, your aunt's condition, everything—I won't say more about that. But there's something I do want to say, my dear, and you must let me say it, for I can't bear to see that shadow in your eyes without trying to drive it away by telling you what you've done for me, for this whole town, and for countless other people everywhere."

"Mrs. Snow!" protested Pollyanna, in genuine distress.

"Oh, I mean it, and I know what I'm talking about," nodded the invalid, triumphantly. "To begin with, look at me. Didn't you find me a fretful, whining creature who never by any chance wanted what she had until she found what she didn't have? And didn't you open my eyes by bringing me three kinds of things so I'd have what I wanted, for once?"

"Oh, Mrs. Snow, was I really ever quite so—impertinent as that?" murmured Pollyanna, with a painful blush.

"It wasn't impertinent," objected Mrs. Snow, stoutly. "You didn't mean it as impertinence—and that made all the difference in the world. You didn't preach, either, my dear. If you had, you'd never have got me to playing the game, nor anybody else, I fancy. But you did get me to playing it—and see what it's done for me and for Milly! Here I am so much better that I can sit in a wheel chair and go anywhere on this floor in it. That means a whole lot when it comes to waiting on yourself, and giving those around you a chance to breathe—meaning Milly in this case. And the doctor says it's all owing to the game. Then there's the others, quantities of others, right in this town, that I'm hearing of all the time. Nellie Mahoney broke her wrist and was so glad it wasn't her leg that she didn't mind the wrist at all. Old Mrs. Tibbits has lost her hearing, but she's so glad 'tisn't her eyesight that she's actually happy. Do you remember cross-eyed Joe, that they used to call Cross Joe, because of his temper? Nothing went to suit him, either, any more than it did me. Well, somebody's taught him the game, they say, and made a different man out of him. And listen, dear. It's not only this town, but other places. I had a letter yesterday from my cousin in Massachusetts, and she told me all about Mrs. Tom Payson that used to live here. Do you remember them? They lived on the way up Pendleton Hill."

"Yes, oh, yes, I remember them," cried Pollyanna.

"Well, they left here that winter you went in the Sanatorium and went to Massachusetts where my sister lives. She knows them well. She says Mrs. Payson told her all about you, and how your glad game actually saved them from a divorce. And now, not only do they play it themselves, but they've got quite a lot of others to playing it down there, and they're getting still others. So you see, dear, there's no telling where that glad game of yours is going to stop. I wanted you to know. I thought it might help—even you to play the game sometimes; for don't think I don't understand, dearie, that it is hard for you to play your own game—sometimes."

Pollyanna rose to her feet. She smiled, but her eyes glistened with tears, as she held out her hand in good-bye.

"Thank you, Mrs. Snow," she said unsteadily. "It is hard—sometimes; and maybe I did need a little help about my own game. But, anyhow, now—" her eyes flashed with their old merriment—"if any time I think I can't play the game myself I can remember that I can still always be glad there are some folks playing it!"

Pollyanna walked home a little soberly that afternoon. Touched as she was by what Mrs. Snow had said, there was yet an undercurrent of sadness in it all. She was thinking of Aunt Polly—Aunt Polly, who played the game now so seldom; and she was wondering if she herself always played it, when she might.

"Maybe I haven't been careful, always, to hunt up the glad side of the things Aunt Polly says," she thought with undefined guiltiness; "and maybe if I played the game better myself Aunt Polly would play it—a little. Anyhow, I'm going to try. If I don't look out, all these other people will be playing my own game better than I am myself!"

CHAPTER XXV
JOHN PENDLETON

IT WAS just a week before Christmas that Pollyanna sent her story (now neatly typewritten) in for the contest. The prize winners would not be announced until April, the magazine notice said, so Pollyanna settled herself for the long wait with characteristic philosophical patience.

"I don't know, anyhow, but I'm glad

Silver Spoons

One for Every State in the Union

The Christian Herald has made arrangements with one of the largest silverware manufacturing concerns in the country for the distribution of silver spoons, one for each of the forty-eight States. Women all over the country are collecting these State spoons.

Every spoon has on it the name and the seal of the State it represents, and each one has wrapped around it the special guarantee from the manufacturer, agreeing to replace free of charge any spoon which does not give satisfactory service to the purchaser.

You May Secure a Set FREE

and in addition you may secure, without cost, a beautiful sugar spoon representing the Capitol of the nation, with the name "Washington" and a bas-relief of the Father of his country upon it.

Many people are securing sets as gifts to friends or relatives, for such occasions as Weddings, Anniversaries, etc. They are the heaviest kind of silver plate and will be an ornament to any dinner table.

The Uncle Sam Sugar Spoon, which is given Free in connection with the sets of six teaspoons, is a real triumph of the silversmith's art. A plain drawing of it is shown here, but it must be seen to be appreciated. The bowl is large, smooth, and free from ornamentation. This makes it easy to clean:

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

MRS. A. A. P., Brooklyn, N. Y., wishes to acknowledge answer to prayer for strengthening of mind and hands. Mrs. M. R. H. writes from Winchester, Va.: "January first I sent a request for prayer that my little daughter might be restored to health and regain the power of speech and the use of her hands and limbs. She was desperately ill at that time. Her peculiar case baffled our very best physicians. In a few days after I sent my request she began to improve, at first very slowly, then more rapidly, until now she is almost well. The physicians say it is almost a miracle. I know it is an answer to prayer and I thank God from the depth of my heart for his wonderful goodness." Mrs. J. A. Hardy, "Mother" of the Prayer League, sends the good news that special prayer for her dear ones is being answered and asks the continued prayers of the league for them. Mrs. J. S. B. writes from Cortland, Neb.: "Words cannot express my gratitude to God and the Prayer League and also others who have helped in praying for my children." Mrs. M. E. U. writes from Woodham, Ont., acknowledging prayer that she might become fonder of studying God's Word and that she be given special work to do for him. She rejoices in having now a class of Sunday school scholars to lead and help.

Acknowledgments of answered prayers have also been received from H. H. (for a revival at Columbiaville, Mich.); Mrs. M. E. S., Newburgh, Ore.; J. A. C., Independence, Iowa; Mrs. M. THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

Continued from preceding page 'tis so long," she told herself, "for all winter I can have the fun of thinking it may be the first one instead of one of the others, that I'll get. I might just as well think I'm going to get it, then if I do get it, I won't have been unhappy any. While if I don't get it—I won't have had all these weeks of unhappiness beforehand, anyway; and I can be glad for one of the smaller ones, then." That she might not get any prize was not in Pollyanna's calculations at all. The story, so beautifully typed by Milly Snow, looked almost as good as printed already—to Pollyanna.

Christmas was not a happy time at the Harrington homestead that year, in spite of Pollyanna's strenuous efforts to make it so. Aunt Polly refused absolutely to allow any sort of celebration of the day, and made her attitude so unmistakably plain that Pollyanna could not give even the simplest of presents.

Christmas evening John Pendleton called. Mrs. Chilton excused herself, but Pollyanna, utterly worn out with a long day with her aunt, went to him joyously. But even here she found a fly in the amber of her content. John Pendleton had brought with him a letter from Jimmy, and the story was full of nothing but the plights of Mrs. Carew were making a wonderful Christmas celebration at the Home for Working Girls. Pollyanna, ashamed though she was to own it to herself, was not in a mood to hear about Christmas celebrations just then—least of all, Jimmy's.

John Pendleton, however, was ready to let the subject drop when the letter had been read.

THE BETTER LIFE

How Conscious Energy Makes It Possible for All of Us

Become Superior to Your Present Self. The Swoboda System can make a better human being of you, physically, mentally and in every way. It creates a greater activity of the forces of life which in you are partially dormant, thus compelling them to become more alive and positive, enabling you to grow and evolutionize to a higher state of perfection. The Swoboda System can do more for you than you can imagine. It can so vitalize every organ, tissue and cell of your body as to make the mere act of living a joy. It can give you an intense, thrilling and pulsating nature. It can increase your very life. I not only promise it, I guarantee it.

WHY BECOME PREMATURELY OLD IN WHOLE OR IN PART?

Why Take Less Than Your Full Share of Life and Pleasure? Are you living a full and successful life? Why not always be at your best?—thoroughly well, virile, energetic. Why not invest in yourself and make the most of your every opportunity? It is easy when you know how. The Swoboda System points the way. It requires no drugs, no appliances, no dieting, no study, no loss of time, no special bathing; there is nothing to worry you. It gives ideal mental and physical conditions without inconvenience or trouble.

The Swoboda System of Conscious Evolution is no experiment. I am giving it successfully to pupils all over the world. I have among my pupils hundreds of doctors, judges, senators, members of cabinet, ambassadors, governors, thousands of business and professional men, farmers, mechanics and laborers, and almost an equal number of women—more than two hundred thousand people have profited through this system.

Your Earning Power, your success depends entirely upon your energy, health, vitality, memory and will power. Without these, all knowledge becomes of small value, for it cannot be put into active use. The Swoboda System can make you tireless, improve your memory, intensify your will power, and make you physically just as you ought to be. I promise it.

AGE IN YEARS AND AGE IN BODY ARE NOT IDENTICAL

You are only as young as you are physiologically efficient

What Others Have to Say:

"One year ago I was an old man at forty; today I am a youth at forty-one."
"I must state that the principle of your system is the most scientific, and at the same time the simplest, I have ever heard. You do not misrepresent one single word in your advertising."

"Just think of it, five weeks ago I was ashamed of my physique; today I am almost proud of it. I am delighted with Conscious Evolution."

"Fourteen years ago at the age of 68 I was an old man; today at the age of 82 I am the marvel of my friends; I am younger than most men at 40. Your system gave me a new lease on life."

"Last week I had a reading of my blood pressure, and was gratified to learn that it was fully ten points below the previous reading. This was a surprise to me as well as to my physician, who did not believe that my blood pressure could be reduced because of my advanced age."

"Doctors told me I had hardening of the arteries and high blood pressure. They advised me against exercise. Conscious evolution reduced my blood pressure and made a new man of me."

"The beauty of your whole advertisement is that every word of it is the truth. Your system is the most wonderful in the world; it gave me new energy, strength and life; in other words, it made a new man of me. I have been an advocate of your system since the first day I used it. I have withstood a mental strain during the past year which would have broken my health had it not been for your system."

"Can't describe the satisfaction I feel."

"Worth more than a thousand dollars to me in increased mental and physical capacity."

"I have been enabled by your system to do work of mental character previously impossible for me."

"I was very skeptical, now am pleased with results; have gained 17 pounds."

"The very first lessons began to work magic. In my gratitude I am telling my croaking and complaining friends, 'Try Swoboda.'"

"Words cannot explain the new life it imparts both to body and brain."

"It reduced my weight 29 pounds, increased my chest expansion 5 inches, reduced my waist 6 inches."

"I cannot recommend your system too highly, and without flattery believe that its propagation has been of great benefit to the health of the country."

"My reserve force makes me feel that nothing is impossible, my capacity both physically and mentally is increasing daily."

"I have heard your system highly recommended for years, but I did not realize the effectiveness of it until I tried it. I am glad indeed that I am now taking it."

"Your system developed me most wonderfully."

"I think your system is wonderful. I thought I was in the best of physical health before I wrote for your course, but I can now note the greatest improvement even in this short time. I cannot recommend your system too highly. Do not hesitate to refer to me."

"You know more about the human body than any man with whom I have ever come in contact personally or otherwise."

"Your diagnosis and explanation of my brain trouble was a revelation to me. I have had the best physicians of my State, but your grasp of the human body exceeds anything I have ever heard or known. I have read your letters to many people, also to my physicians, who marvel at them."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

PERSIAN CHRISTIANS SLAUGHTERED

ONE of the saddest tragedies of the great war was reported by the cable on March 24 in despatches from the American missionaries in Urumia, Persia. There is a Christian population in northwestern Persia of some 50,000 souls, who are known as Nestorians. They are descendants of the ancient Assyrians and their forefathers were among the earliest converts of Christianity, dating their conversion, it is said, to the preaching of the apostle Thomas. They are regarded as the oldest and purest of the Oriental churches and have clung to the simple faith through all the centuries, in the face of many hardships and persecutions.

These people live in a primitive way in scattered hamlets known as the Assyrian villages, which lie north and west of Urumia. When Turkey entered the war as a combatant, large bodies of Mohammedan troops, including Askaris (regulars) and Kurds (irregulars), entered Persia and captured Urumia, Tabriz and several other cities which had been previously occupied by Russian forces, Persia being under the protection of Russia and Great Britain. The Turkish invasion carried peril to the Assyrian population and also to thousands of Armenians who, having left their own country, had sought temporary shelter in Persia. Many fled north into Russia, hundreds perishing during the long winter journey over the frozen hills and swamps. Large numbers sought refuge in the compound of the American missions at Urumia and Tabriz, where they hoped to find safety under the protection of the Stars and Stripes.

The latest developments of this pitiful situation are described in the cable despatches, which state that the Askaris and Kurds have begun a campaign of persecution and massacre against the Assyrian Christians. Dr. Henry C. Packard, of the American Presbyterian Mission at Urumia, bravely risked his life at Geogtapa, where three thousand Assyrians, who had taken up arms to defend their families, were in deadly peril of massacre. They had been killed in flight and for three days had withstood the Turks, but when Dr. Packard reached the scene, they were defenseless and in despair, the last of their ammunition having been expended. The doctor, risking his own life, went between the lines crying a large American flag unfurled, on seeing which the Turks abandoned their attack and the refugees were saved. Two hundred Assyrians of the same place, however, who had sought shelter in a church which was fired by the Kurds, are reported to have perished in the flames.

At the time the message was sent there were 10,000 Christian refugees in the shelter of the compound of the American Mission at Urumia, and under the protection of our flag. The French Mission had yielded asylum to some two thousand more. The Turkish regulars, disregarding the right of missionaries to give sanctuary in such cases, are reported to have forced their way into the American mission, hanged the Orthodox bishop, Mar Elia, and other Orthodox pastors, and beaten and insulted Rev. R. Allen, an American missionary. There were twenty soldiers in the party who perpetrated this outrage. The French Catholic Mission was also invaded and it is reported that sixty refugees were dragged out and killed, in spite of the appeals of the mission workers to spare them.

Frightful atrocities, that recall the Armenian massacre of 1896, are reported as having taken place in the Assyrian villages. There were 103 of those villages a few months ago, all of which have been visited with slaughter and destruction. At the village of Gulpashan, which had held out longer than the others, the Kurds ordered all the Assyrian men and boys out into the streets, where they tied them together in groups of five, marched them to the cemetery and killed them. They then slew the older women and the little children, and carried a number of the younger women off into captivity. It is not accurately known how many of the unfortunate nople, directing him to make the strongest representations to the Turkish Government and to demand that full protection be given to Americans and American interests in Urumia. All our diplomatic and consular representatives in Turkey, Russia and Persia are being directed by the State Department to report promptly any information reaching them, which may throw light on the situation.

At the New York headquarters of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions it was not feared up to March 26 that any serious harm had befallen the missionaries themselves. From various sources the information has reached the board that the Kurdish chiefs leading the attacks had given strict orders that American missionaries were to be unmolested.

Mr. Scott of the Presbyterian Board explained that very likely the execution of the Orthodox bishop was in retaliation for the hanging of a number of Kurdish leaders and Moslem mullahs, or priests, some years ago by the Russian authorities. Some estimate of the influence which the missionaries hold may be gained from the statement made in an official communication to the board that last October when the situation became critical the Russian consul had begged Dr. Packard to remain, pleading that he considered the moral effect of his presence and that of some half dozen other missionaries might accomplish more in the way of quieting the natives than the consul's own guard of 800 Cossacks. It was thought that if Mr. Allen had been attacked it could only have been under some such circumstances as that he had harbored certain refugees and had refused admittance to those who came demanding that they be delivered.

Dr. H. P. Packard is one of the most popular and greatly beloved missionaries of Persia. Some months ago the Foreign Mission Board had decided to transfer Dr. Packard to a more important post. The announcement gave rise to such a storm of protest from his friends in Urumia that this decision was altered. Among the communications received by the board on this occasion is the following, addressed to Mr. Robert E. Speer, secretary of the board, from the governor of the province:

To the presence of exalted Excellency, Mr. Speer, Head of the Presbyterian Board, may his fortune endure:

During the whole period of his service as a missionary in Urumia, Dr. Packard has been entirely occupied with administering medicines and remedies to the sick of this province. In truth and good conscience the people of this province are wholly grateful for the good results of his work as a physician and for his personal character. His presence in this province is regarded as an extraordinary benefit. Now that we have recently heard of his expected recall, the people of Urumia of every rank have been heavy-hearted and sorrowful; for they regard the loss of this benefit at this time as their own misfortune. We understand that a letter has been written to you in regard to reversing the decision for Dr. Packard's departure from here, requesting, for the sake of completing his benefit to us and of perfecting his love, the continuance of Dr. Packard's mission here. In accordance with the wish of the people of this province and of the government and of the members of the bureaux of administration I trouble you with this writing and make request from your excellency that you permit Dr. Packard to remain here. There is no doubt that you will not fail to help in this matter and will render grateful the government and all the administration and the people of this province.

Imam Kuli Mirza, whom Dr. Shedd, who forwarded the communications to New York, characterized as the most generally respected man among the nobility in Azerbaijan, closed his letter with these words:

In short, on behalf of the inhabitants of the region of Urumia in particular and the people of the province of Azerbaijan in general and because of the pleasing conduct and skill and Assyrians perished during the numerous attacks by the Mohammedans, but estimates at the Urumia Mission are that some 20,000 are either dead or missing, while 12,000 have sought refuge in the Caucasus and 17,000 were still in deadly peril at the time of sending the despatches. No official confirmation of this news had been received at the time of writing. The refugees are utterly destitute, all their property having been destroyed.

On March 26, two days after the sending of the first cable despatch, Hon. Gordon Paddock, American consul at Tabriz, wired to Washington, via Tiflis, Petrograd and London, that the American Mission at Urumia had been the scene of still further violence by Turkish troops. Messages added the startling information that the Turks had beaten some of the American missionaries and insulted others. Consul Paddock's telegram includes a statement from one of the American missionaries, Rev. Robert M. Labaree, to the effect that the Turkish consul at Urumia with a detachment of troops forced his way into the missionary compound and seized some of the native Christians who were under the protection of the American flag. They were removed from the mission and put to death most brutally.

Reports of the serious situation in northern Persia, received by our State Department at Washington, have caused much uneasiness, and there is a full appreciation of the grave danger to which the missionaries are exposed at a time when Kurds seem to be uncontrolled and committing atrocities wherever they please. natures of groups of citizens of Urumia, all praising Dr. Packard in the highest terms and insisting that he be allowed to remain in Urumia.

The following simple and touching letter was received a few days ago by a Persian friend of the Christian Herald staff, who is at present residing in New York. It was written by his mother and dated Tiflis, February 10.

It is a long time I have no word from you since you left Paris, and I am surprised not to hear from you for a long time. When I was in Tabriz, the refugees started to come from Urumia and Salmasse. We had seven relatives from Salmasse. We left the city of Tabriz in a hurry and we left everything home. Now I am at Tiflis with my sister, but I tell you that Salmasse and Urumia are completely ruined and no word from my daughter. I am anxious to hear from them because her husband is sick and she has four children. I am thinking only of her.

The Presbyterian Board, in a letter lately issued, gives a eminence witnessed in the being of Dr. Packard, all of which is a God-given blessing to the people of this kingdom and for which all are grateful, I give this trouble to your excellency and request that our beloved friend, your excellency, would grant that Dr. Packard as long as he lives may be a missionary in Urumia, so that all should rejoice and be glad in the benefits of his goodness and share in the benefits of his deeds in medicine.

Letters were also received bearing the signature of touching picture of conditions in the Urumia district, drawn from letters from these distressed fellow Christians. The sufferings and disasters have been indescribable. The flight of women and children through mountain roads filled with snow where no shelter nor relief of any sort was available cost many lives. Survivors of the plundered villages are in dire need. It is estimated that there are fifty thousand refugees at Tiflis, Tabriz and Urumia. J. O. Barnard, a missionary of the Church of England, describing the flight of the Persian Christians which began on January 2, writes to the board as follows:

"Practically the entire Christian population of the Urumia plain and neighboring districts was in flight. As far as the eye could reach in both directions was a constant stream of refugees, sometimes so dense that the road was blocked. It was a dreadful sight, and one I never want to see again; many old people and children died on the way." The long journey from Urumia to Tiflis was made afoot in the depth of winter over frozen mountains and through half-frozen swamps, with no provision for the journey. A naturalized American citizen from Tiflis: "During the ten days' journey we witnessed a long chain of men, women and children most of them walking in cold and mud without shelter. We have seen many women and children dead on the way, as they could not endure cold and fatigue." Villages were destroyed, homes looted and private property confiscated.

From Tabriz, Frederick N. Jessup, an American missionary, writes: "Every one is seeking safety with us—French, Belgian, Swede, Austrian, man, Turkish, Armenian, even Moslems. The Armenians are in great terror, and every one is fleeing the Kurds and their coming. All our school buildings are given over to refugees; some from Maragha have absolutely nothing; others have walked fifty or sixty miles on foot in the winter blinding leading or carrying children, leaving everything behind."

Copies of the board's letter have been sent with the co-operation of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, to five thousand Protestant churches in the United States.

THE KIND OF TURKISH IRREGULAR TROOPS (KURDS) WHO ARE KILLING CHRISTIANS

At the time of closing this issue, no new developments have been reported in the situation as given above. While there seems no good reason to hope that the conditions are less terrible than as described in the newspaper accounts, yet it must be borne in mind that no detailed confirmation of the story has been received or at any rate given out by the State Department at Washington.

The various mission boards are in possession of fragmentary information only, and have no complete and authentic report from the scene of this latest massacre. The news as above is on the authority of the despatches in the press and is subject to whatever modification may be made necessary.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

THE fall of Przemysl was the great event not only of the week past, but of the Galician campaign since the capture of Lemberg in September. This "fortified and entrenched camp," to give it the technical name invariably used in military treatises, is located on the main line of the Galician Railroad, one hundred and fifty-two miles east of Cracow and sixty miles west of Lemberg. The town, as contradistinguished from the camp, is one of the centers of the oil industry and has, in late years, acquired both importance and population on that account. With 54,000 inhabitants, of whom a large minority are Jews, it is today an active, bustling place, with many of the characteristics of our own oil towns in their palmy periods.

As a defensive fortification the camp was very strong, and was deemed untakable by assault or artillery fire, and it is worthy of note that neither of these brought about its surrender, hunger having been the compelling cause.

From the beginning of their Galician campaign the capture of Przemysl has been one of the main objects of Russian tactics, as, with this strong place in the possession of the enemy, it was almost an impossibility to initiate any serious movement having as an objective either Cracow to the west, and through Cracow, Silesia or Hungary, to the south; nor could the complete conquest of Galicia itself be attempted with serious hope of accomplishment.

The siege of Przemysl, which has just ended successfully for the Russians, is, chronologically, the third. Twice before have they surrounded the camp, and twice have the Austrians been able to break their circumscribing lines and relieve the defenders, and after each check the Russians have managed to rally and beat off the relieving force and resume the siege. Finally, as a result of the third siege, and after a desperate and honorable resistance, the white flag was hoisted on Sunday last, March 21, and parleys looking to surrender entered into, which culminated on Monday in the formal surrender of the stronghold.

as far as possible, the artillery and fortifications of the stronghold so as to render the prize as valuable as possible.

As to the number of prisoners taken in the capture there is some dispute. The Russians claim to have captured 9 generals, 73 officers of the Austrian general staff and 2,500 other officers, and about 119,000 men. On the other hand, Baron Szarvasky, Hungarian minister of the national defense, made an official statement that "Russia's aims at Przemysl are without foundation. At no time did the garrison number more than 25,000 men. This included trench-diggers and other military laborers. By their gallant efforts, however, these soldiers

On the Friday preceding a last desperate sortie was made by a portion of the garrison which, the hope of being able to cut their way through the Russian lines to safety, failed. This sortie was preceded and followed by such an extravagant expenditure of ammunition by the besieged army as to leave the impression that at the end of its resources and desirous to consume the remainder of its ammunition prior to surrendering.

This turned out to be true and it was also found, subsequent to the surrender, that the remainder of the garrison had been employed in dismantling and destroying hel at bay a Russian army many times their number, and forced the enemy to believe the garrison was much larger." The truth is probably somewhere between the figures given in the two statements. The amount of war material captured is not yet accurately known, but must be very large. Przemyśl being now definitely in the hands of Russia, what will be the next move, against Cracow or Hungary?

Every possibly Hungary will be chosen as the objective, for the reason the Cracow presents the greater difficulties, in that before this town can be threatened for the third time the Russians must first break through the Austrian defenses along the Dunajec River, which are said to be very strong. Besides, they must break the Austrian line along the Rur Nida in Poland or run the risk of finding themselves in a false position strategically in front of Cracow, with their line of communication in continual danger of lateral attack by superior forces. The calling of Cracow the key to Silesia is an assumption and not the statement of a fact.

The German frontier in East Prussia has been defended successfully and there is therefore little reason to suppose that, even assuming that Cracow falls into Russian hands, the defense of Silesia, from the German side of the frontier, where the system of strategic railroads is very completely developed, will present any greater difficulty.

The passage of the Carpathians also presents some difficulties, but they seem less than those at Cracow, and it is probable that the Russian attack will be made there.

The rich country of Hungary would be as great a prize as Silesia, and Budapest is not to be despised. However, there is some distance between the present Russian position and that city, and before it is traversed, if it has not already been traversed it ever is, many days and many weeks will have passed away. Besides which, at any moment during the time which must necessarily elapse before that goal can be attained, a decisive German victory in Central Poland, with its consequences, would make the entire Russian position in Galicia and a position in or across the Carpathians almost impossible to hold.

In addition to this important episode, at the end of the week one of the most important states of the war in the terrain is in progress in Galicia, on the northern slope of the Carpathians, in front of the entrances of the Dukla, Jask and Lupkow passes. The Russians are endeavoring with the greatest fierceness to make themselves masters of these passes, with the ultimate design of penetrating into the rich and fertile Hungarian territory on the other side of the mountains, and the Austrians are resisting with vigor and tenacity. Late but yet unconfirmed reports declare that the Russians have taken the passes.

In Bukowina there has been some fighting during the week north of Zernowitz, from which quarter a Russian attack looking to the recovery of the possession of the crown lands is presently impending. In southern and central Poland, as far north as the isthmus, nothing of any importance has taken place during the week.

In northern Poland the Russians have been endeavoring principally to force the Germans to abandon the idea of the fortress of Ossowetz, but unsuccessfully, and the bombardment continues unabated. A German move against Ostrolenka fortress has had some measure of success, both in ground gained and in prisoners taken. Aside of these two rather important happenings little took place.

A Russian force had last week possessed itself of Memel, a port in the extreme north of East Prussia, and is endeavoring from thence to attack it. This force was, about the middle of the week, attacked by the Germans, both from the sea and by land, and driven out of the town and again across the border. Most of its men were either destroyed or captured. Outside of these events there has been little of interest in this field.

apparently much less powerful. Aeroplanes have also been used quite freely in attacking ships. It became known that the German submarine U-12 was sunk in one such attack, on March 12, off the Scottish coast, and it is believed that others have been put out of business. The British Admiralty has announced that the U-29, one of Germany's most powerful submarines, has, according to reliable reports, been sunk with all her crew. The U-29 had sunk many British ships.

The Russians and Turks have been doing considerable fighting during the week, principally on the Russian frontier north of Lake Van in Asia Minor, and the appearances are that the Russians gained a slight advantage. There was also a skirmish on the Suez Canal, opposite the town of Suez, between a Turkish and British force, ending in the retreat of the Turks. The railroad across the Sinai Peninsula, being built by the Turks and Germans, is not yet finished, and it now looks as though real fighting would not take place here until this was finished.

There has been some fighting between a British force, led by General Botha, of Boer war fame, now premier of the Union of South Africa, in German Southeast Africa, resulting to the advantage of the British.

During the first two months of 1915, according to a report just issued, French foreign trade decreased $126,400,000 a month from the normal, this decrease being about equally divided between exports and imports.

This shows a considerable improvement over the earlier months of the war.

Germany now claims to hold 805,000 prisoners of war, the majority of whom are Russians. This is an army in itself. Many of these are being used in agricultural work.

The recruiting for Kitchener's new armies is said to have gathered a little over 2,000,000 men. About thirty per cent. of these are ready for the front, or are at the front. Canada and Australia contribute together another 150,000 ready for the line of battle. The Australians, however, are mostly being held in Egypt in view of the possibilities of trouble arising in or near that country, as it is apparent that the Turkish movement toward Suez and Egypt has not been abandoned.

The material damage done to Poland and East Prussia by the contending armies is estimated at about one and a half billion dollars. There is a report from Berlin that all of the German warships lost during the war have been replaced by new vessels. This would be perfectly possible, as at the outbreak of hostilities Germany had enough ships in course of construction to more than replace those reported lost to date. It will also be remembered that some little time ago the British Admiralty said that the British navy was stronger, particularly in first-class ships, than it was last August.

The situation in Serbia must be extremely bad. Sir Thomas Lipton, who has just returned from there, and who, it will perhaps be remembered, came near being killed a few days ago in the streets of Belgrade, reports that typhus is raging violently and that the dead lie exposed in the churchyards because there are not enough living to dig graves for them.

A cable from London states that the Italian Embassy there, to silence dangerous rumors which have been afloat, issued an official statement to the effect that "it has no information confirming reports that Italy is about to forsake neutrality," and "that Italy stands now where she has always stood."

This last phrase may be interpreted to mean either of two things: first, that Italy stands neutral, as she has stood always since the beginning of the war; or, second, that Italy stands

GERMAN MACHINE GUN IN CONCEALED POSITION, FLANDERS

The aeroplanes and Zeppelins have made several raids during the week, with, as far as we know, comparatively little result. The most spectacular was a German attack on Paris and the railroad station at Compiègne, near Paris, which accomplished but little. The most successful was the British raid on Hoboken, near Antwerp, where the German submarine construction plant is located, and where considerable damage was done.

The submarines made several victims during the week, but did not in all cases sink the vessel torpedoed. This is very probably the result of the new form of torpedo which the Germans are using for this work, which, being much less expensive, is estimated at about one and a half billion dollars. There is a report from Berlin that all of the German warships lost during the war have been replaced by new vessels. This would be perfectly possible, as at the outbreak of hostilities Germany had enough ships in course of construction to more than replace those reported lost to date. It will also be

REQUIREMENTS FOR A REVIVAL

"If my people, which are called by my name, shall humble themselves and pray, and seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways; then will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin, and will heal their land." II Chron. 7: 14

THE Bible is an encyclopedia of spiritual knowledge. It is not discursive, but exceedingly intensive in its directions. We are not disappointed when seeking from it information about religious revivals. This text epitomizes the Bible philosophy of the subject. It very tersely and logically sets before us the essential conditions upon the fulfilment of which God promises to bless his people.

The word "revival" is often given a meaning which primarily does not belong to it. Many emphasize the conversion of sinners as the essential element in revival work; but that is the secondary meaning of the word. Essentially, "revival" means the quickening of God's people. You cannot revive a dead man. The unregenerate sinner is spiritually dead. He must be born again. Now, you may revive a partially drowned body, or a partially frozen body. The regenerate soul's life often weakens and wanes, until the flame almost flickers out. But if there be the least spark of life left, it can be fanned into a flame; and like the apparently dead cinder in the smithy's forge, that spark will touch others and kindle a flame that will enthuse a church, a city, or even a nation. A revival of religion, then, must logically begin with the church. Such is the divine order.

To Begin at His Sanctuary

This is also the historic development. All the great revivals have begun with the people of God. After they have been quickened and cleansed, divine life has flown through them unto the world. It was so with that wonderful revival in the reign of good King Hezekiah. He began with the house of God. The temple was first cleansed. The idolatrous altars were broken down. The heathen idols were destroyed. The priests were purified, and the people made confession of their sins. Then it was that the mighty wave of spiritual influence from heaven moved out through this faithful nucleus until it touched the nation. It was so on the day of Pentecost. Before sinners were converted the apostles themselves needed to be baptized. The revival began, not in the streets of Jerusalem, but in that upper room where for ten days they waited patiently upon God. After the Holy Ghost came upon that little band of faithful disciples, there was no difficulty in reaching and saving the masses. The fruit gathered by one day's testimony numbered 3,000 souls.

It was so in the great revival at Ephesus. When Paul entered that city he was amazed to find the influence of worldliness. The little church of a dozen believers was huddled in a corner, apparently useless. Every phase of wickedness was openly flaunted. Paul called a prayer meeting. The Holy Ghost came upon them. The revival began then and there. The little church, enthused with divine power, went forth and conquered the city for Christ. Ephesus was turned upside down. Politics were purified. Society was fumigated. Business was bettered. And the devil's devices found their natural habitat in flames.

In view of this Biblical philosophy we may now arrive at a clear definition of a revival. A religious revival is the awakening of the callous conscience of the church to its relationship to God, and the reviving of the energies of the church unto the salvation of sinners. Let us follow now the rhetorical order of the various steps suggested by the text. You will notice the passage contains a promise, which hinges upon certain conditions. God says he will hear, forgive and heal the land if his people will humble themselves, pray, seek his face and turn from their wicked ways.

* Director of evangelistic work and member of the Inter-denominational Association of Evangelists.

The Part of His People

First, consider carefully the conditions. God's promises always hang upon conditions. If we are faithful in their fulfilment, he is faithful to his pledge. The first condition is that of humility. We are to humble ourselves, empty ourselves of every vestige of self-aggrandizement. God is jealous of his glory. He will not give it to another. If we are to enjoy the blessing he must enjoy the praise.

We are to pray. You may think that is easy. Some praying is; but prayer offered in the right spirit is often hard work. Jesus agonized in prayer. The prayers of Gethsemane drew blood. These are the prayers that have power with God and prevail.

We are to seek his face. How often in planning for a revival do we turn our thoughts from heavenly energy to earthly effort, from God to man! We expect the pastor to work miracles. We send for an evangelist to "get up a revival." We forget it is "not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." To seek God's face is to draw near to him—to have him alone as our dependence.

We are to turn from our wicked ways. You are apt to rebel at the insinuation of being called wicked. Alas, that is because you do not know your own hearts! The briefest catalogue of our sins is appalling. Would you care to write them down in order? Begin, then, with sins of omission: neglect of Bible study, of prayer, of the means of grace, neglect of interest in your unsaved friend and in backsliding Christians. Need I mention ingratitude to God, lack of self-denial and self-sacrifice? Now, catalogue a few of your sins of commission: pride, envy, levity, evil speaking, evil temper, designed deceptions, dishonesty, hypocrisy—all of which have become stumbling-stones, no doubt, to your companions. To experience a revival, God says we must turn from these, forsake our sins and repent. "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me." God can use only clean vessels to carry the waters of salvation to the parched lips of the lost. We need to unite with the psalmist in his penitential prayer, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me. Cast me not away from thy presence and take not thy holy Spirit from me. Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation, and uphold me with thy free Spirit. Then will I teach transgressors thy ways, and sinners shall be converted unto thee."

Then Will He Hear from Heaven

Having thus examined the conditions upon which God bestows his blessing, let us now regard the fulness of this blessing, as contained in his precious promise.

The promise. God says "I will hear from heaven." Heaven is not far from earth. It is, however, too far for some prayers to reach. They must be winged with the strong pinions of faith if they are to penetrate to the throne of God. Our text is proof that God hears prayer. It is his articulate answer to Solomon's humble petition at the dedication of the temple.

God will forgive. This should beget confidence. Even that gloomy catalogue of sins which we just enumerated, and which has convicted us of the possibility of cavil, ought not to discourage one, since God has flung out this blessed hope of Father's forgiveness.

He will heal our land. The promise is not only to the individual. Each one of us will be revived; the families will be revived, the churches, the city. And it will not stop here, for the whole land will feel the pulsation of a great work of grace.

Such is the history of the religious movements that have affected nations. They have begun in a small way. Mighty revivals have germinated from the prayer of a single devout child of God. In 1857 six Christian business men gathered for prayer in a room in the Dutch Church in New York City. Who can estimate the influence of the First Street prayer-meeting upon the religious life of America, if not on the world! The great revival of 1857 began there, and it is within the memory of some still living to recall the far-reaching effect of that religious movement. It was confined to no location or condition. It spread from the Atlantic to the Pacific, until every town and city in our land was aflame with religious enthusiasm. Nor did the waters of the sea quench it. The tongue of fire leaped across the Atlantic and kindled spiritual experiences that are a testimony to God's power unto this day.

He Is Faithful Who Hath Promised

Consider finally the Author of this magnificent movement. God says he will do it—the "I," the omnipotent Jehovah—the same yesterday, today and forever. His arm is not shortened. His hand is stretched out still. In the mighty religious upheavals of history we get a glimpse of the power of his divine dynamic. Nothing is impossible with him. We cannot conceive the infinite resource of omnipotent power that are reserved for the use of his children.

Remember that his faithfulness has never been shaken. He is faithful who hath promised. Not one jot or tittle shall he vary in his word. Remember his willingness to do all that he has promised—more willing than we are, even, to save him to do it. And remember that in the divine economy faith is the lever and prayer the fulcrum that are to move the arm of Jehovah. Here our weakness becomes strength.

Hell Gate in New York harbor was a menace to the shipping interests of the port. The government decided to remove the dangerous obstruction. For years men tunneled under the river. They stored tons of dynamite in the honey-combed rocks. They attached an electric cable to the mines. Upon an appointed day the banks of the river were lined with thousands of spectators. Many were doubtful as to the efficacy of the enginery to be employed in the destruction of the mountain of rock beneath the water. General Newton, the engineer, brought his little child into the office where the batteries were located and pressed her tiny finger upon the button. Instantly there was a trembling like an earthquake, a roar like thunder, an eruption like a volcano. Sea and sky seemed to meet. Hell Gate was no more. A little child—and father—did it!

GOSPEL BREVITIES FROM MANY POINTS

—DR. FRENCH E. OLIVER has just closed a successful five weeks' revival campaign at Bakersfield, Calif. The churches united and were greatly strengthened and energized as the result of the meetings.

—VOLUNTEER LABOR from four churches joined in constructing a Gospel tabernacle at Alma, Mich., and the work was completed in just 20 hours. The building is 60 by 120 and has a seating capacity of 1,500. All the material was donated.

—REV. ROBERT MCWATTY RUSSELL, D.D., LL.D., president of Westminster College, has just accepted the call of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago to the chair of Doctrine and Homiletics, and also will be associated with the dean, Dr. James M. Gray, and other members of the faculty in evangelistic and Bible conferencework. Dr. Russell is a native of Pennsylvania. He has held two notable pastorates, one for six years in Caedonia, N. Y., and the other for nearly sixteen years in the Sixth Church of Pittsburgh, both being marked by evangelistic and missionary enthusiasm.

—THE REVIVAL AT MEDINA, N. Y., conducted by Evangelist George E. Burgess and Musical Director B. F. Butts, held in the Medina Tabernacle (decorated with Christian Herald flags), has produced remarkable results. The total number of decisions was about 850, and the meetings called together the largest audiences under one roof ever known in Orleans County.

—THE WEEK BEGINNING April 11, 1915, has been set aside by a number of the leading religious bodies for prayer in behalf of a better Sabbath observance. Many pastors will preach upon this subject at some time during that week. The New York Sabbath Committee offers helpful literature free to all who may be preparing for these services. Requests for literature should be made early and the particular phase of the subject specified. While the literature is given freely, the committee will not refuse stamps to cover postage. Requests should be directed to Rev. William P. Swartz, Ph.D., secretary, 31 Bible House, New York City.

—A UNION EVANGELISTIC MEETING closed lately in Fort Wayne, Ind., in which twenty-five churches joined. Dr. Milford H. Lyon and his party of workers were called to that city for a campaign during January and February. During the meetings every activity of the city life was directly touched. Shop meetings were held, store meetings, meetings in the court house, in the surrounding towns and wherever a meeting could be scheduled. Nearly 5,000 persons decided for Christ in the revival. More than twenty-five hundred have joined the various churches in the past two weeks, and others will follow. Seventy Bible Study Classes have been organized in homes, stores and factories.

—REV. RALPH L. MILLER began on Monday, February 28, a series of evangelistic meetings at Mount Gilead Baptist Church, East Orange, N. J. Rev. L. B. Twisby, pastor. Mr. Miller is formerly a familiar figure in the world of professional football, and as Leon Miller held the banter of the world's championship. He also, for a time, followed the race track as a jockey. In his present work he has much to say of the evils of the race track and prize ring. He has recently conducted evangelistic campaigns in New Rochelle, N. Y., and Greenwich, Conn.

Doing the Impossible

SUNDAY, April 11. Luke 18: 27. "The things which are impossible with men are possible with God." We have not to travel far before we meet the impossible. We soon reach the end of the short road of "the possible," and then the impossible looms before us! It is possible to restrain a man from crime; it is impossible to restrain him from sin. We can compel a man to pay his income-tax; it is impossible to compel him to be generous. We can readjust a man's circumstances, we cannot renew a man's heart. We can educate, we cannot regenerate. We can refurbish a man's mind, we cannot give him the mind of Christ. We can give him courtesy, we cannot endow him with grace. We may give him good manners, we cannot make him a good man. We may save him from worldly excesses, we cannot make him immune from the contagion of the world. We may "patch up a bad job," but we have no power of new creation.

And so we touch our "impossible" almost at a stride. The "impossibles" stare upon us on every side. How then? It is only in God and in the power of his holy grace that the impossible thing can be realized. In the Lord Jesus miracles may happen every day; they are happening every day! But in our pathetic folly we go on trying to mend the broken earthenware, when the mighty God would recreate the vessel. We rely upon the ministrations of good fellowship when we can do nothing without the communion of the Holy Ghost. We use social cosmetics upon a withered and wizened society, and the holy Lord is waiting with the unspeakable quickening of the new birth. We use rouge when we really need the blood of the Lamb.

The world is always arrested when it sees impossibles being accomplished. In God the impossible becomes possible!

Though earth and hell the Word gainsay,
The Word of God can never fail:
The Lamb shall take my sins away.
'Tis certain, though impossible.
The thing impossible shall be.
All things are possible to me.

He Helps Us to Overcome Our Besetting Sins

MONDAY, April 12. Isaiah 28: 1-13. "The Lord of Hosts . . . shall be for strength to them that turn the battle at the gate." Isaiah denounces the great sin of that day—and, alas! of every subsequent day—the love of strong drink. He speaks in pathos terms of the destruction which must befall the land that had nourished a race of drunkards, and proclaims the imminence of judgment. The valleys, terraced with vineyards, would become desolate, and all their beauty would be as a fading flower. Then, in contrast to the glorious beauty of the vintage, he sets the Lord of Hosts! The lust of the eyes and the lust of the flesh must pass away; only he who doeth the will of God shall endure for ever. The crown of the drunkard's pride would be trodden under foot; but for his own the Lord would be a crown of glory and a diadem of beauty.

But we need in this hard world more than glory or beauty. Some of us are called to make for ourselves and pronounce for others momentous decisions; and others to exert themselves to hurl back the enemy who endeavors to rush the gate. But for each function God is the storehouse of all-sufficient grace. To the one he will be the Spirit of judgment, to the other of Strength. All that we need to do is to draw upon him by a faith that bristles in what it needs by a daily, hourly act of spiritual inhalation. What enemy are you trying to withstand? Strong drink? Passion? Jealousy? Pride? Whatever it is, be of good cheer! The benediction of Miss Havergal's power was the moment when she definitely trusted God to overcome her besetting sin. When the enemy comes in like a flood, the Lord will lift up a standard against him, and will empower you to turn him back at the gate.

Optimism an Aid to Right Living

TUESDAY, April 13. Genesis 50: 20. "And as for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it for good." Joseph is speaking to his brethren at the burial of his father, Jacob. He looks back upon the track of his misfortunes, the evil that he suffered at the hands of his jealous brethren who sold him into Egypt, and with that optimism that only a firm believer in God can have, saw not evil in it all, but the divine hand leading him through shadows to light. Joseph caught the spirit of the New Testament Gospel, which says in the words of Jesus, "Your sorrow shall be turned into joy," and in the speech of Paul, "All things work together for good to them that love God."

Joseph's career passed from selfishness to unselfishness and to sympathy by reason of the things which he suffered. He realized that in sorrow as in gladness the spirit of a man may move upward, and that seeming defeat and so-called penalty may be turned into victory, in accordance as we believe in God.

George Matheson has likened Joseph's life to Chopin's prelude, each of which has three parts, and each embodying a distinct sequence. "In the first, the melody is free and unrestrained. In the second it seems to move through tangled places—to be impeded in its way by the intervention of resisting elements. But in the third, the melody comes out into the open once more; the tangles vanish, the impediments are removed, and the notes of the first part reappear in a new connection and with a fresh power."

Joseph passes from his free life of favored youth into dungeon darkness, but he is great enough to discern that, in his tunnel of shadow, he was moving all the time, and now he comes out into the radiance of clear day by way of his sorrows. He has learned that "God meant it for good."

He Is Sufficient for All Our Needs

WEDNESDAY, April 14. John 6: 16-29. "He saith unto them, It is I, be not afraid." The Greek word here is very significant. It might be rendered, "I AM." This is not the only instance of its use by our Lord. "I that speak to thee AM." "Before Abraham was, I AM"; and we may add the reference to himself as the True Vine, the Resurrection and the Life, the Shepherd and the Door, the Bread and the Water of Life. Not in the least degree are these blessed assurances less reassuring or helpful for us, upon whom the ends of the ages have come, than for those to whom they were first addressed. It is often our experience to be constrained to go before him into the storm. Often we toil hard at the oar, and make but slow progress. Sometimes we think ourselves forsaken and forgotten; and we misread his dealing with us. Then suddenly we become aware of his presence, and hear the sweet reassurance, "I AM."

It is admissible to affix to those words what we will. When first spoken to Moses at the burning bush, they were intended to connote the unchangeableness, the all-sufficiency and the presence of Jehovah. It seemed as though Israel was invited to affix whatever it needed for its emancipation from Egypt, and the supply of all requisites in the Exodus march. All this Jesus is willing to be and do in regard to us. He is always with us, for his second advent cannot make him nearer than he is. He never changes; and he invites us to fill up this blank check as we will, writing our greatest need after his majestic assurance, I AM. "I AM thy shield and thine exceeding great reward."

The Secret of Abiding Success

THURSDAY, April 15. Deuteronomy 31: 6. "Be strong and of good courage, fear not, nor be affrighted at them: for Jehovah thy God, he it is that doth go with thee; he will not fail thee, nor forsake thee." Last words are always fraught with impression. These are among the last words of 120-year-old Moses to Israel, uttered shortly before his death. They are a part of that wonderful and explicit instruction and warning given by the prophet who stood for the people Godward to those who were to be led by Joshua "over this Jordan" into the land which Jehovah had sworn unto their fathers to give them. The words are repeated again and again to Joshua and they contain the message that every modern man may take into his work and responsibility.

The root of our troubles and anxieties lies usually in the conception of ourselves as working alone.

The secret of abiding success exists in the ability of conceiving what Jesus seems constantly to feel: "I am not alone; the Father is with me."

How shall we be able to secure and to retain this sense of God's presence? First, there must be the consciousness that God is with us, in us, always associating his life with ours, since he has made us for himself and therefore cares for the way we take. We are told in Genesis that God made man in his own image and likeness. Claim your sonship. Realize your birthright as a son of God. It will give you a new and lasting self-respect—"Jehovah, he it is that doth go with thee."

Phillips Brooks once confessed that he only found the rich intimacy of God's presence when he became ready, if God willed it, to go into the humblest pulpit in the country and there, unheralded and unknown, to serve his fellow men. Desire for personal renown had been his idol, standing between himself and the source of divine presence. God comes in when the opposing idols of our own selfishness are broken.

He Abased Himself for Our Sakes

FRIDAY, April 16. Philippians 2: 1-11. "He became obedient to death, even the death of the cross." These stages in the descent of our Lord from the highest to the lowest are extremely wonderful, as we study them under the strong light of the apostle's inspired thought. The voluntary refusal to make use of those divine attributes of deity, which were his by native right! The assumption of a servant's obedience to laws, which as King he himself had promulgated! The passing by the nature of angels that he might stoop to the low estate of fallen, sinful man. And that finally he should become obedient to the most shameful and painful death of any! Here is the wonder of wonders!

There are many modes of death. The death of the young girl, who fades away in consumption, almost without pain, or as sometimes with the anticipation of returning health. The death of the beloved friend, fading into life, in the midst of a group of loving friends, as our Lord might have passed back to God from the home of Bethany, with Martha ministering to every need and Mary anointing him with sweet ointment!

No! He must die the death of the cross! He would not have it said that any of his friends or followers had tasted of a bitterer cup than he had drained to the dregs, or passed through darker rooms than he had traversed beforehand. He desired also that the cross should become sanctified, ennobled, beautified in our thought, and that we might choose it as the daily portion of our inner experience, saying with the apostle: "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom I am crucified to the world, and the world to me." Seek nothing better for thyself than the wondrous, shameful cross! F. B. M.

The Special Gift to the Consecrated Soul

SATURDAY, April 17. Luke 24: 49. "Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high." The Pentecostal baptism comes after completeness of consecration and waiting faith in the promise of the Father. All agonizing precedes faith. While we tarry we know that he will not tarry beyond the divinely appointed moment.

Each individual experience of holiness may be the same in its purity and power, but unlike in other manifestations, as flowers are of many colors and shapes, though all of circular form. Each person may use words expressive of the baptism which seem adapted to his own blessing. To Dr. Boardman, the Presbyterian, it was "the higher life." To Dr. Earle, the Baptist evangelist, it was "the rest of faith." To John Wesley it was "entire sanctification," while his brother Charles sang himself into the "second rest." The beloved John on the bosom of Jesus found "perfect love," while Paul was "filled with all the fulness of God." There are different manifestations, but the same spirit. There was Charles G. Finney's pulpit power of burning logic, Wesley's power of holy song, John Knox's power of holy boldness, Moody's evangelistic power, Müller's power of faith and William Booth's organized power for rescuing millions from the slums of sin.

MY MAIDEN SERMON

AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL RECOLLECTIONS OF A MOMENTOUS EVENT IN THEIR MINISTERIAL CAREERS BY FOUR SUCCESSFUL AMERICAN PASTORS. COMPILED BY G. DOUGLAS WARDROP

Large Room for Improvement

By the Rev. William Pierson Merrill, D.D., Pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church, New York

MY FIRST sermon was not really mine at all. I remember distinctly that I was afraid of my own thoughts, and very careful to set forth approved ideas. I had heard some one speak on "The Relation of the Christian to the World," using four texts in the 17th chapter of John. So I used those texts, and developed the thought along lines very conventional and prosaic, ending with a vision of heaven as the true home of the Christian. It was an eminently safe and meaningless discourse.

I recall an incident or two in connection with that sermon. In the course of conducting the service, desiring to pray for the country, I said: "Bless our land, Lord." I was overcome with dismay, but few noticed the double possibility of the petition. I remember an old Dutch elder approaching me, at the close of the service, and saying: "Dot's goot; you have still one more year at the seminary?" and when I answered affirmatively, he said: "Dot's good; I hope you will improve a great deal."

But my first real sermon I find indexed as No. 8. Up to the time of preparing this, I had followed conventional lines, carefully avoiding any attempts at originality. But I recall vividly my decision one morning to "look in my heart and write." I shut myself in a room, and wrote what I thought and felt, regardless of tradition. How different that sermon was in form and effect and in my own satisfaction! As I read the two now, No. 1 and No. 8, they are not very dissimilar. But in passing from one to the other, I passed from patchwork to preaching. I count No. 8 my first real sermon. Its text was "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good; abstain from every form of evil." I preached it four times the first year; it was one of the sermons which led to my first call. I have an abiding affection for it such as I have for no other sermon I have written, numbering now some two thousand.

A Congregation of Seven Souls

By the Rev. J. Wesley Johnston, D.D., Litt.D., "Amman Dale"—Pastor of the John Street Church, New York

WAS it a sermon? Of that both the preacher and the congregation had serious misgivings. Just how to describe or rather classify it even at this late date is somewhat difficult.

Just a few weeks before I had been promoted from the ranks of the Exhorter, called at times, with a large measure of truth, "Exhauster," and had been duly qualified as a Local Preacher, which dignity I was trying to bear with simple modesty and ministerial pride. Knowing that the time was at hand when I would have a place on the "Circuit Plan," a number given to my name, and certain dates and places assigned to my number, I at once began preparations for my first appearance in a pulpit. Going to a stationer's I bought a well bound, nicely ruled blank book, of about two hundred pages, for I meant to write my sermons with much care, having a feeling that they ought to be kept in book form and not on loose sheets liable to be torn or lost. Then I selected three or four subjects which seemed easy of treatment, such as the Last Judgment, the Origin of Sin, Conditional Immortality, and others of like simplicity, to which I gave such serious attention as I could spare from my other studies. Finally, I started to write in my blank book; with fine flourishes I wrote the text, taking care to give it in full, deeming that any abbreviations or word signs would not be in harmony with the dignity of either the theme or the sermon. After this I paused. I looked at the ceiling. I read the text again; it didn't seem quite as simple as when I had turned it over in my mind. Having no commentaries at hand and not being fully certain of the exact meaning of some words in the text, I gave that special passage up for the time and selected another, with which I had a measure of success. This might seem to imply that I wrote a sermon on that text. Implications, however, are not always just. I wrote something. To that I humbly confess. And what I wrote I had the audacity to preach, for youth often has the most reckless courage.

One day a letter came from the military chaplain saying that I was appointed to preach in the Wesleyan church at Richmond, a suburb of Dublin, two or three miles out. Never having been to the Richmond church, and knowing nothing of the size or nature of the congregation, I spent much anxious time and thought in arranging for my first pulpit service. Accompanied by a young friend, also a ministerial student, I started for Richmond, a walk of fully two miles. It was a pleasant morning and we might have enjoyed each other's company and conversation, but we were both burdened in mind, for I was to preach at the first service and my friend at the second. So we trudged along in silence.

At length we reached the church, a small unpretentious building, standing some way back from the street. Going in I found seven persons, two men and five women, nearly all well on in years. Sitting down I waited for the congregation to arrive, the solemn silence being broken by the heavy ticking of a large clock and an occasional whisper by one of the old people. Suddenly a rather shrill voice piped out: "If either of you young men is going to preach, it's time to begin—the congregation is all here." Seven! Seven old people. And for them what mental and spiritual agonies I had suffered!

Confused, nervous and perspiring I got through the devotional part of the service, and then in such voice as remained I announced my text. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit." I opened with a lengthy description of the interview between Christ and Nicodemus, sharply criticizing Nicodemus for coming at night, claiming that such an act was cowardly. This gave me a chance to say a lot of things of people who were not there, and who would never hear a word of what I said. But I rattled on making it hot for Nicodemus with his evasions, his indirect questions, and his incredulity. How I did belabor him! I gave him such a vigorous trouncing that I kept one of the old men in my congregation half awake; the other one was fast asleep soon after I announced my text. Wise man! I probably didn't think so then. I do now.

After having disposed of Nicodemus I went into an exhaustive study of meteorology, explaining to my own comfort and satisfaction wind currents, vacuums, atmospheric pressure and all the rest of it. So satisfied were two of the old women with my explanations that they nodded with approving fervor, though their eyes were shut most of the time.

Having thus prepared the way I entered with ease and assurance on my real theme—"the movement of the divine Spirit on the human soul." Having dabbled quite a little in metaphysics, I was now quite at home, quoting from text-books, referring to this one and that one, causing the one wakeful woman and the half wakeful man to glance frequently at the clock, fearing that the time would be up before I had finished that part of the sermon!

But greatly to their surprise and grief I stopped rather abruptly, having vainly beaten the air for the space of nearly forty minutes. I have never preached from that text since. I have made peace with Nicodemus. I have, however, the book in which the sermon is written. Nothing would induce me to part with it.

A "Dumb" Animal Competitor

By Rev. Arthur Lowndes, D.D., Secretary of the Christian Unity Foundation

I REMEMBER quite well the great pains I took in the preparation of my first sermon. I committed it carefully to memory and was letter perfect when the time came for its delivery. It was preached to a small congregation of farmers and their women-folk. It was a beautiful summer's day, when all the windows and doors were wide open, and my subject was on the "Silence of God." I remember I spoke of the wonderful silence of God in the Bible, and how silently he governed his great world, how our human ears could not hear the noise which this world of planets and stars made in their progress through space, and how God governed our souls so silently. I remember quite well how impressive I thought I was when I said "and on this beautiful day we hear no sound"—and the deep silence was broken by the deep braying of a donkey, who brayed sonorously, thrice!

I had to pause, fearing the effect of this anticlimax on my congregation, and I scanned their faces apprehensively, but not a muscle moved; their faces wore the same stolid expression as they did done throughout the sermon. Whether I preached or the donkey brayed—it was just the same.

My shortest sermon was preached the first time I addressed a city congregation. I had been and several times to preach there, but the distance was great and the difficulty of providing some one to take my place in my own pulpit was even greater. However, the occasion arose, and I went down to the city thoroughly prepared to make a "hit" with one of my very best sermons, which I had completely memorized. I ascended the pulpit. Before me were the faces of many kind friends who had labored to give me this occasion. I announced my text, and then suddenly, swiftly, in the twinkling of an eye, everything went out of my head! To gain time I repeated my text, very slowly—but still my mind was a perfect blank. Nothing was in it and I could get nothing out of it. Again I repeated my text, and this time said a few foolish words. Finding my mind still a blank, I turned round and gave a description, and descended from the pulpit. I had been altogether five minutes there, from first to last. This was the shortest sermon I ever preached. My friends with whom I went to dinner had the grace to say nothing, but I was never asked to preach in that church again, though my friendship with these people ripened and continued for years till, owing to the death of the father, the family moved away to the Pacific Coast.

"Steadfast and Unmovable"

By Rev. Alexander Harris McKinney, Superintendent New York City Mission Society

MY FATHER left his home as a lad of sixteen. The expected and toiled-for fortune was not accumulated. It was thirty-four years before he voluntarily exiled himself to his native place. While there he spoke of his son who expected to become a Presbyterian minister. Many and insistent were the appeals for the young man to come and get acquainted with his father's family. The next summer found him in the home of his ancestors. Although he was not to enter the theological seminary until the following autumn it was settled that he must preach to his friends from the pulpit of the church of which his great uncle had been pastor for forty years.

On that bright August Sunday morning there were fifty-two blood relatives and many other relatives by marriage, who patiently endured my maiden sermon, which had been prepared with agonizing and forebodings during the preceding week.

Knowing that the majority of those who would listen to me were descendants of the Covenant men and women who were ready to die for the faith once delivered to the saints, stalwarts who made many sacrifices for the sake of their religious convictions—I concluded that much would depend on the text selected. In this conclusion I made no mistake. When I announced with great solemnity at the text for the morning discourse was: "Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord," I was at once conscious that my hearers were pleased. In fact, some were so well satisfied with my apparent orthodoxy that they went to sleep at once. One young woman, a cousin, who sat directly in front of the high pulpit, placed her arm on the back of the pew before her, laid her head on her arms and did not show her face until the closing Psalm was announced. Whether her action was caused by pity for me, by a desire to miss something of the great sermon, or by weariness, I have never ascertained.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

JUST CAN'T BELIEVE THE NEWSPAPERS. Secretary the Navy Daniels has ordered an investigation to determine if reports that have appeared in the press to the effect that submarines are being constructed in sections in this country and shipped abroad for use in the war, are true. The information is doubtless desired for the State Department, as it is understood that the State Department is exceedingly indignant over the idea of such a violation of moral neutrality as to construction and shipment of submarines. Now the Secretary of War were to start investigating cartridge plants—but the State Department has got around to cartridges as yet.

WELLES PLUCKS SIXTY-FIVE FROM SEA. On March 22, while homeward bound after discharging a cargo of cotton at Bremen, the Mallory liner Denver, single screw steel steamship, sprung a leak 1,300 miles from New York and signalled for help. It took nearly twenty-four hours for answering vessels to find the Denver, owing to bad weather and darkness, and the St. Louis and the Manhattan came up with her only in the nick of time, taking off the Denver's crew of sixty-five men and the few passengers—members of crews of American ships sunk in the North Sea by German mines according to the manager of the Mallory Line and leaving the vessel to her fate.

JAPAN KEEPS HER FOOT IN CHINA'S DOORWAY. The situation between China and Japan continues strained, though if China would just yield to all of Japan's demands and be done with it, the tension would be relieved. China has consented to several of the demands, amounting to concessions in South Manchuria that give Japan a measure of supervision there, and Japan has moved a considerable body of troops into China and has it on a very stern face indeed.

IN THE HOLLOW OF CARRANZA'S HAND. The war in Europe has prompted the planting of somewhere to four million more acres in spring wheat this year than at any previous time in our history, a tremendous crop being predicted. To harvest this cereal, American farmers are dependent upon binder twine made largely from sisal grass grown in Yucatan. We cannot vouch for the fact, but the Christian Herald has printed within a year an article which declared that our importations from Yucatan support the worst slavery in existence today. At present this product, so necessary to the harvesting of the wheat crop, is held up in Yucatan ports by Mexican bands under Carranza, who has proclaimed a blockade of the Yucatan coast. To circumvent this obstacle the administration at Washington has authorized the use of a warship to carry near a million dollars from binder twine manufacturers to the port of Progreso for payment to the Yucatan Government for the sisal awaiting shipment, or rather to Carranza agents in charge of the customs. The American flag recently was torn down and insulted by bandits of Zapata, whose "soldiers" killed the American McManus. Demands from our government that the murder be officially investigated and the criminals punished, and that the insult to the flag be promptly repudiated and amended, are still pending with the Mexican "government."

MOTHERS VS. INSTITUTIONS. New York state has placed a Widowed Mothers' Pension bill upon its books, the purpose being to allow to such mothers, when found worthy, a sum for the support of their dependent children equal to that which the state would otherwise pay for the care of the children in an institution. Child welfare boards will be appointed in all counties to carry out this law.

HE WON HIS VICTORY, TOO. For successfully negotiating the latest war loan for the German government ($2,250,000,000), Dr. Karl Helfferich, secretary of the imperial treasury, has been decorated by the Kaiser with the Iron Cross, Second Class. This loan, sufficient to finance the war until autumn, was subscribed by the people of the empire.

SEEKING TO RELIEVE US OF ANXIETY. In friendly concern over our perplexities about the Philippine question and the matter of immigration to California, a number of prominent politicians of Japan have secured signatures to a petition which they have presented to the Japanese premier, Count Okuma, calling for the purchase by Japan of the Philippine Islands. If consummated that would, of course, solve the question of Japanese emigration to California, and that of the bestial by the United States of independence upon the Filipinos.

TO DRY OUT SASKATCHEWAN. The government of this Canadian Province announced through its premier March 19 that it would make liquor a political issue by proposing government control of the traffic and the total abolishment of the retail sale of intoxicating liquors across bars, dispensaries to take their place.

PRESIDENT DEDICATES FAIR BY PROXY. The Panama-Pacific Exposition was given a clean bill of opening on March 24 when Vice-President Marshall, on behalf of President Wilson, formally opened and dedicated the exposition as a glorification of the completion of the Panama Canal built "to make the whole world kin. There are two gospels now," said Mr. Marshall; "the Gospel of good will has been supplemented with the gospel of personal contact." A regiment of United States regulars and several enormous guns, besides some mines, have been sent to the Canal to regulate the gospel of personal contact.

WAR BECOMES AN ALLY OF SOCIALISM. Labor has already been hailed as the hope of each of the belligerent nations, but England has now placed Labor beside the throne in order to assure the continuance of the necessary output of war munitions, a law recently enacted being the formal recognition of the new relation between the state and labor. By this law the government can take over the manufacturing plants of any and all industries at will and transform them into war-supply factories. In principle this has been one objective of Socialism for years. David Lloyd-George, chancellor of the exchequer, commenting upon this revolutionary step said: "This document ought to be a great chapter for labor." And he added: "This country would inevitably be deprived of victory in the war if labor failed us." Though the chancellor did not specifically include American labor, he meant it. A committee of business men serving as a governmental labor advisory committee will immediately classify every factory in the British Isles, tabulate its productive capacity and other facts pertinent to the purpose in hand, and as rapidly as needed these plants will be taken over and operated by the government in the manufacture of munitions of war.

THE H. K. W. L. D. R. S. K. F. FORMED. If the members of this new organization attempt to pronounce its name while in the condition in which they would put the boys and men of the state, the result will be a fair sample of the soundness of their reasons for being organized. The Hotel Keepers, Wholesale Liquor Dealers and Retail Saloon Keepers' Federation of New Jersey, representing invested capital of more than $75,000,000, will have headquarters at Trenton and wage a systematic campaign against the foes of drunkenness, woman suffrage being included by them in that category.

AMERICAN SUBMARINE LOST. While engaged with a flotilla in target practice, two miles out from Honolulu Harbor, March 25, the submarine F-4 carrying a crew of twenty-three men went under water as part of the maneuvers, and failing to return to the surface within the usual time, the others began an active search for her, aided by the naval tug Navajo and vessels from the harbor. Grapplers made fast to some object on the bottom of the ocean at a depth of three hundred feet, about twenty hours after the F-4 went down, and this was believed to be the missing submarine, and hope was entertained that her crew might still be alive. But divers, at the expiration of another twenty-four hours, discovered that the grapplers had laid hold of an old anchor, and a new search was necessary, the F-4 being finally located and parts of her superstructure brought to the surface. This was on March 28, three days after the accident, and special contrivances were then under construction for bringing the fated submarine to the surface, no further hope being possible that any of the crew would be found alive. The F-4 was commanded by Lieutenant L. Ede of Reno, Nevada, junior grade, age 28 years.

THE SOUTH MOURNS WIDOW OF STONEWALL JACKSON. Accompanied by a military escort, and in the hush of suspended business and public affairs, the body of Mrs. Mary Anna Jackson was taken to Lexington, Va., March 26, and laid to rest beside that of her distinguished husband, General "Stonewall" Jackson. Mrs. Jackson died in the old Jackson homestead at Charlotte, N. C., March 24, aged 84. She was born near that city, her father being the Rev. Robert Hall Morrison, a Presbyterian minister, founder of Davidson College. Mrs. Jackson always spoke of General Jackson as a lover of peace.

THE IMPOSSIBLE HAS HAPPENED. A Chinese typewriter has been invented. It has 4,200 characters. It has only three keys. It can make 50,000 letters or characters by combinations of the basic 4,200. It is still a crude affair, but workable, and perfected models are under way. To write a letter you turn a cylinder upon which are the 4,200 characters, until the right one comes opposite the key-word of the guide on another cylinder, then you strike the printing key just as on an American machine, then you begin a still hunt for the next character which you are to print—and so on while reason lasts.

WANDERLUST. Two German ships would like to leave our ports, but are at present curbing their spirits. One, the Hamburg-American steamer Odenwald, in port at San Juan, Porto Rico, having been refused clearance papers by advice from Washington, essayed on March 21 to ignore convention and depart without proper authorization, whereupon American guns sent first two shots across her bow and then fired directly at her hull to compel her return, the Odenwald sullenly taking the hint and returning to her berth. At Newport News, Va., the Prinz Eitel Friedrich, the German cruiser which inadvertently sank the pet of the American sail-rigged merchant fleet, is ready for flight upon the first night that is dark enough for her to evade the British cruisers said to be waiting for her just outside the harbor, provided, of course, that she has not by then exceeded her time for recuperation in a neutral port, as in that case American cruisers will insist upon the Eitel's remaining through the war.

War and the Gospel

WITH the cry, "Lay down your arms!" the Gospel has nothing to do." These words, from the lips of Bishop Faulhaber of Speyer, spoken at Berlin on March 19, make a startling challenge to those who hold that the whole tenor and spirit of the New Testament is against war.

"The Gospel," the bishop said, "as a message of international love among mankind finds, it is true, no pleasure in the mutual massacre of nations, but the peace greeting of the Gospel is not a political truce toward men; it is a religious peace toward God. Nowhere do the Gospels say, as the peace propagandas falsely assert, that peace has precedence before war. In the light of the Gospel the fable of eternal peace appears as a superstition."

There is one emphatic answer to the bishop's argument, an answer implied in his own words, but which he does not see. The New Testament teaches peace because it teaches love. There are no exceptions to Christ's imperious command: "I say unto you, love your enemies!" This was the new Gospel to the world. And it is new yet. The church has been so blinded by the superstitions of patriotism that she has not seen these fiery words of Jesus. She has been so deafened by the often meaningless shouts of nationalism that she has not heard Paul's bold call to internationalism in the words: "God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth."

The trouble is that confessed Christians insist, as does the bishop of Speyer, on living in the Old Testament rather than the New. Do these people never read the tenth chapter of Acts, nor the first part of the eleventh chapter, nor the fifteenth, nor the thunderous passages from Paul's Epistles in which he insists that the national and racial limitations of Judaism have been flooded out of sight and thought by the stream of Christ's blood, shed on Calvary? He was to make both Jew and Gentile one in mutual love and in united worship.

Who can think of Christ, the Christ who was so gentle with little children, sanctioning the slaughters of the nineteen hundred and fifteenth year of his grace? Who can think of him viewing with anything but agony such scenes as these from the siege and fall of Przemyśl: "For seven days prior to the fall of the fortress the people had nothing to eat." "Numbers of the men were dropping from exhaustion, while others had not strength to leave the trenches, and ate moss and gnawed at the straps of their equipment to keep themselves alive." The writer of this article saw the other day a photograph of a soldier's hand shot through with a dum-dum bullet, the photograph showing a clean hole on one side and a great, ghastly, star-shaped tear where the mushroom bullet had plowed its way out on the other side. Can we think of the wounds, the corpses, the widows, the wailing orphans the war has made and say that the Christ of the Gospel approves?

Suppose Jesus of Nazareth, incarnate, were to meet today in some room with the hundred men who are controlling the present plans of Europe's bloody campaign. What would he say to them? Would he tell them to go on fighting? Would he take the part of either side and say they had done right? There cannot be the slightest doubt what he would say to them. He would cry: "Cease!" And, moreover, they would cease. They are fighting because they have forgotten him.

God is the Father of every soul on earth. Christ is the Elder Brother of all. We are all brothers, sisters, neighbors, friends. Statesmen must learn that the same rules which Christ so plainly laid down for individual life apply to national and international life. Nations must learn that they exist, as our own President has so nobly declared, to serve one another.

The Gospel teaches war! That is a hideous thought! Christ and John and Paul know only one standard, only one law, only one plan of life—and that is love! And there is no more justification for a Briton hating a German or an Austrian hating a Russian than there is for a man who lives in Indiana to hate a man who lives in Ohio, or for a boy who lives on East Eighth Street to hate a boy who lives on East Ninth.

The church must rise above the narrow limits of nationalism. The church must get the international viewpoint of Jesus and his early allies. It was the world that God so loved as to give his only Son for. We have not begun to catch the meaning of that love and that sacrifice until we have come to recognize that the life of a man or woman or child in any other country is as precious as the life of one in our own.

India's Mass Movement Christward

FRIENDS, there is very little pleading with the people here to become Christians, in these days; the pleading is on their side, that we will receive them." These amazing words, coupled with the statement that in his district there are 8,000 converts waiting to be baptized, are from the pen of Rev. Charles E. Parker, superintendent of the Vikarabad District of the North India Methodist Episcopal Conference. His communication appears in the third number of a new periodical being published in India under the name of the Mass Movement Era. Every page is full of most intensely interesting material, telling of the wonderful movement toward Christianity of India's people. During 1913, Methodist Episcopal missionaries and pastors in India baptized thirty-five thousand converts; ninety-five thousand in three years.

Rev. Brenton T. Badley describes this mass movement as one in which people enter the Christian Church not singly, nor even as families, but in companies or groups, and in considerable numbers. He states that so far these converts have come from the lower castes and the outcasts, but says wisely that this is by no means to be regretted. "The common people," he reminds us, "heard Jesus gladly, and it was the publican and the sinner that entered the Kingdom under his preaching. If Christianity can demonstrate its work of regeneration among these 'depressed classes' it has thereby given the most compelling proof of its power to save and uplift." He states that the mass movement is not confined to any one denomination, but cites among the missionary societies sharing in its results the American Presbyterian, the American Baptist, the Church Mission and the Wesleyan Methodists.

Dr. Parker, in the article first referred to, quotes from a letter received from one of his preachers: "The people of this circuit are crying out very much, saying: 'Thirsty! thirsty! thirsty!' and they are begging, saying: 'Preach to us! Preach to us! Baptize us!' Most of them are begging very much for preachers, saying that they will give half the money for building houses for them. As the kingdom of heaven is at hand the people are repenting now. The Holy Spirit is working everywhere and in everyone. When the people speak to us and I see that there are no preachers to send to them my heart is burning and burning within me."

The stories of how the new Christians endure persecutions, the story of how one little girl led two hundred of her fellow villagers to Jesus, must be left till another time. But the foregoing will stir the heart of every Christian who reads these lines; will stimulate our faith; will give us new hope for the revival now spreading through our own land and will kindle flames of missionary enthusiasm which will lead to fresh sacrifices of giving and of going.

Losing God

A RECENT letter to the Prayer League, asking the prayers of Christian Herald readers, contained these terrible words: "I am losing God!"

More people are in this condition than realize it. In a thousand ways God may be thrust out of our lives. We do not know this is happening. We should resent the suggestion that it is happening. Yet it may be happening just the same. Few would set about deliberately to put God away. Yet we do the same thing by choosing other interests than his; by putting other things first—giving him second or third place in our thoughts instead of first; by beginning to care even a little more what somebody else thinks than what he thinks; by doing some of the little things which we fear may not altogether please him, and growing to care less and less whether he is pleased or not; by toying with our faith, and letting it slip away; by refusing to meet some test to which he challenges us; by refusing to do some plain duty he puts straight before us.

We need again and again to be forced back to a recognition that nothing else in life can count the weight of a grain of sand in the scales against God's approval and God's presence. We choose for an hour—instead of for eternity; we choose for the approval of a few people for a few years than for the approval of countless multitudes who shall know our worth at the Judgment Day; the destiny our deeds have determined; we choose the love of some friend rather than God's love, getting that only God's love can put us into position to truly help and bless the life we live.

Do not lose God. You cannot afford to lose him. Those for whom you care cannot afford to lose you. Those whom your life may touch cannot afford to lose you. Those whom your life may save cannot afford that you should lose them.

Best of all, you need not lose him. Turn to him now. Seek him first before stopping to compute any other matter. Oh, how near he is! How long he has been waiting for you! How eager he is to catch the first whisper of welcome to return to the full companionship of other Christians!

The friend who writes us need have no fear that she has actually lost him. The fact that she has written us is proof that he is very near. She and all of us who have lost anything else between our souls and our God, have but to turn away the obstructing object and we shall find him waiting with his blessing and his comfort. Or, there may not be any such dividing obstructing object. He may simply be that our faith has wavered. We have fancied the blessings of the past too good to last; that we have imagined again that we must do something to win his favor rather than yielding ourselves trustfully to his love and power. Shall we not all receive again the fulness of grace that flows out of the souls of men from the cross of Christ? Shall we not seize again the hand of Jesus who waits to guide us to the place of blessing? Shall we not at once find God again, our incomparable treasure?

The Sin of Slander

WE READ at intervals in the daily newspapers of slanderers who, by the use of what has been very aptly called the "poisoned pen," drag the good name of members of the community into disrepute and bring grievous trouble into many innocent homes. A typical case of the sort, a slanderer, by writing anonymous letters, upset the peace of a family and drove a church congregation almost to distraction. Another, by similar secret methods, which was added the crime of forgery, brought school authorities and citizens in an attitude of sharp antagonism. There is nothing sacred in the slanderer. There are few so good that they are not evil in mind, which shoots its arrows from ambush and finds some weak point to strike, some opportunity to depreciate, some way to bring sorrow to the heart.

Slander, with all its variety of names and degrees—detraction, talebearing, depreciation, public making, censoriousness, aspersion—is one of the meanest of vices. It is the special sin of the envious and revengeful natures. Secret slanders, aggravated form of the offense, is the refuge of the weak and cowardly, who hope to accomplish their stealth and secrecy what they dare not attempt in the open. Through this sin, hearts are estranged, homes are broken up, reputations are ruined, lives are blighted and health and happiness destroyed. And where the slander is secret, it is often easier for the victims to be defenseless.

How guarded, then, we should be against the approaches of a foe from which all need to be protected. "Speak not evil of one another"; "uttereth slander is a fool." The unruly tongue is a scourge; life and death are in its power; it is a devouring fire; it cannot be tamed. So says the Scripture; and where the evil heart and slanderous tongue take to themselves the aid of the secret pen the combination is one to be dreaded. Meanwhile let us keep our own skirts clean. Let us cultivate generous thoughts of our neighbor; let us avoid "knocking" and mud-throwing and criticism and senseless gossip. If we have no praise for him, then let us be magnanimously silent. Let us hope that the "poison pen" slanderers may be caught and properly punished as an example to the good of society.

Bible Out of Louisiana Schools

—THE SUPREME COURT of Louisiana on March 23 rendered a decision dealing with the public schools of Caddo Parish, under which the reading of the Bible and recitation of the Lord's Prayer at the daily opening of the schools are prohibited. The plaintiffs against the use of the Bible were Catholics and Protestants. It is considered not unlikely that an appeal may be taken to a higher court.

Device for Fighting Tetanus

A REPRESENTATIVE of the Rockefeller Institute has forwarded to the warring nations of Europe an instrument of his own invention, designed to aid in the cure of tetanus or lockjaw, which is one of the greatest scourges of the war. Each of the belligerents is given the right to manufacture as many of the instruments as may be needed by the medical corps. The device is intended to produce artificial breathing and save many lives that would otherwise be sacrificed. The established modern means of preventing lockjaw is by a prophylactic dose of anti-tetanus serum. Recent studies of scientists prove that the germ of lockjaw propagates in the rich soil of battlefields, thus infecting so many wounds and causing untold suffering. The inventor of the new instrument found that an injection of Epsom salts in the spinal membrane of a tetanus patient will produce complete relaxation of the body for hours, thus relieving the sufferer of the frightful strain of convulsions. But the injection is attended by no danger. The relaxation is sometimes so complete that the muscles of respiration may also be affected, so that the person about to get well must be snuffed out of life suddenly. To guard against this danger the instrument is used. Being placed in the mouth, its action restores respiration and saves the patient's life. In the journey through the plague-stricken districts of earth and on the battlefields where the struggle is being waged between right and wrong for the possession of man's soul, there are moral and spiritual diseases contracted and wounds received that are incurable by any human remedy. Christ the Great Physician is the only one who can cure them, and that alone with his own precious blood. "But he was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed." (Isa. 53: 5.)

Converted Cannibals

THE most civilized nations do not have to go back many centuries to find savage ancestors. The Anglo-Saxons had barbarians for forefathers. Jesus Christ turned the savage into the civilized, the heathen into the Christian nations. O all the sudden transformations of savage into Christian nations in modern times none has been more wonderful than that of the Fiji Islands. Haer C. Stuntz, Methodist bishop, with residence at Buenos Aires, in speaking to a meeting of laymen in Columbus, Ohio, the other day, said: "Ninety per cent. of the former man-eaters of the Fiji Islands are now church members in good standing." Bishop Stuntz has had a wide missionary experience and knows the miraculous transformation effected by the Gospel on the hearts of the different races. Christ came to change the individual heart—to take the demon out of it and put the angel in it. The change in the Fiji Islands is in fulfillment of this prophecy: "He shall speak peace unto the heathen: in his dominion shall be from sea even to sea, and from the river even to the ends of the earth." (Isa. 9: 10.)

10,000 Sign Temperance Pledge

ON THE night of March 15, in Billy Sunday's tabernacle in Philadelphia, Secretary of State Baughman made a memorable temperance address in the interest of a nation-wide total abstinence pledge campaign. After an impassioned appeal, Mr. Baughman asked all who would abstain from intoxicating drink to stand. Twelve thousand men arose to their feet, and it is reported that 10,000 men did actually sign the pledge. Mr. Bryan showed that the United States spends every year twice as much money for liquor as for the maintenance of the Federal Government, three times as much as is spent for education, enough to pay for the maintenance of six Panama Canals. In his severe arraignment of drink, the secretary continued: "The use of liquor is the direct cause of crime, poverty, degradation and despair, and we never can tell when we shall ourselves suffer at the hands of those who are the victims of intemperance. Property is insecure and life is unsafe in proportion as the use of liquor contributes to the number of criminals, paupers, and desperadoes. I believe that as sure as I am here alive tonight, I shall live hereafter, and in order that I may do so happily, I must shut off such a dangerous and blighting habit as that of strong drink, and help others to do so." "But Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat, nor with the wine which he drank." (Dan. 1: 8.)

PRISON REFORM AT SING SING

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood

UNTIL recent times, the punitive institutions of the country and the world have been one of the worst disgraces of civilization. The prison cells have been filthy, unhealthy, dismal; and the treatment of the inmates has been harsh and cruel. Within the past twenty years there has been a radical change in this regard, amounting to a revolution. New York State Prison at Sing Sing is attracting the attention of the nation on account of the extremely progressive policy adopted by Mr. Thomas Mott Osborne, who has charge of the institution. His belief is that a criminal can be reformed only by humane treatment, and not by harsh, repressive measures. With this in view, he has allowed more liberty to the men in guarding and governing themselves. He keeps their minds pleasantly employed, and furnishes concerts and entertainments that make an appeal to the better nature. It is claimed that the new plan at Sing Sing is working successfully. There is a place for authority and punishment in institutions, human and divine; but love is the chief force to win the heart and rule the world. Christ and his system are the expression of this love. Mr. Osborne, in dealing with human nature, has only copied the divine example thus described: "Thou hast also given me the shield of thy salvation; and thy right hand hath holden me up, and thy gentleness hath made me great." (Ps. 18: 35.)

Gift for Cats Contested

TO DECIDE which of two coteries of cats and kittens, resident in London, England, should receive a bequest of $31,000 by the will of Miss Caroline G. Ewen of New York City, who left an estate of $300,000, lawyers of two nations filed a report in the Surrogate's Court recently. It seems that the contest is between the tramp cats, as members of the London Institute for Lost and Starving Cats are called, and the aristocratic felines, who, it is said, have the patronage of the royal family, as members of the Animal Rescue League, which is a subsidiary of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Miss Ewen left the bequest to the Cats' Home, Miss Kate Renning, London. It seems there is no such person as Kate Renning in London, and one of the parties contesting says that Miss Kate Cording, who founded a large cat sanitarium, annexed by the Royal Society, was the person meant in the will. Miss Cording began in a small way in 1898, catching stray cats and kittens. At the time of the death of Miss Cording the institution she founded had 300,000 cats and kittens. The healthy ones fed on milk, the sick ones on chloroform. The courts will determine which of the two societies shall receive the money. It might be a good idea to divide the amount, as the cats of London would get the benefit of it. The cat and dog problem in the large cities is a great one, and boards of health are of the opinion that the menace to human life by hydrophobia from dogs and by contagious diseases from cats demands the decimation almost to the point of extermination of these pets that become pests. The superiority of man in the scale of being to the lower tribes is thus declared by Christ: "Ye are of more value than many sparrows." (Matt. 10: 31.)

Refused Praise as Hero

"STOP calling me a hero! Any fellow in the block, who isn't a coward, would have done the same thing." These were the words that greeted friends of James McLoughlin, eleven years old, of Wakefield Street, Philadelphia, when they visited his home to congratulate him on saving the life of Raymond Holdsworth, aged seven. While passing a quarry near his home, he heard loud cries for help. Looking down, he saw his little friend struggling at the bottom, in about ten feet of water. He lowered himself into the quarry, and, while holding his chum in his arms, shouted for help. Passersby heard the screams of the two boys and hastened to the rescue. It was a brave thing for James to do, and he was a real hero, though he disclaimed the fact. Modesty is a beautiful element in human nobility or heroism. He said to the little companions who came to congratulate him on his heroism: "Don't let's talk about what I did, which I ought to have done, and any of you would have done; let's be happy because Raymond didn't get drowned." Look out for this little fellow; he has elements of real greatness. With proper educational and religious advantages, he ought to make a very good and useful man. Next to the bravery that risked his own life to save his friend, was the modesty that minimized his relation to the act. Christ puts a high estimate on this element of character: "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." (Matt. 5: 5.)

Snow Slide Kills Fifty

A SNOW slide from near the top of the mountain swept down the side gathering rocks and trees in its course, burying people and partly destroying the town of Britannia in British Columbia. In the neighborhood of fifty people were killed. There was a report like a dynamite explosion. The slide carried from a ledge a bunkhouse, cookhouse, and houses occupied by families of the miners, and then shot downward, continuing its work of death. Such calamities remind us of the wisdom of the injunction: "Be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh." (Matt. 24: 44.)

Nation's Largest Cotton Crop

THE Census Bureau announces the season's cotton crop of this country to be 16,645,272 commercial bales, including linters. This estimated crop is nearly 650,000 bales in excess of the largest one ever grown. The cotton is on a gold basis, and is very near, if not quite, at its so-called cost of production. But the value of the total crop just reported, including the seed, may approximate between $850,000,000 and $900,000,000 to the South before its final marketing. This would mean a return of between $24 and $25 per acre on the 37,000,000 acres planted last season. There is good news also from the wheat belt. Very little of the grain has been winter-killed. The area sown in wheat last fall was about 4,000,000 acres greater than in 1913. Besides caring for our own people we shall have to furnish much bread for the nations at war. Christ thus refers to the farmer as the basis of all industry, to whom the world looks for its food and clothing, for the illustration of a spiritual truth: "A sower went forth to sow." (Matt. 13: 3.)

OUR RESPONSIBILITY IN THE WAR

BUSINESS BEFORE BLOOD

NOTE: The Electric Steel Company of Pittsburgh has declined, on humanitarian grounds, an English order for four million dollars' worth of steel shells.

All, whither are we drifting now?
What means this pious deed?
Does Pittsburgh think to show us how
To meet financial greed?

STAY! Send abroad our implements
Of death to those who fight;
We have the good, hard business sense
That makes all commerce right.

WHAT matters it though blood be shed?
It is not ours, forsooth!
Our country is not splashed with red,
Nor slain our budding youth.

THE "ULTIMATE CONSUMER" OF WAR MUNITIONS

OUR ammunition and our guns
Are made by peaceful hands,
And why should not our business sons
Feed fat on warring lands?

If others wish to maim and slay,
But lack the means therefore,
Why should we not make fighting pay
And so prolong the war?

THE stench of dead men rotting the
Is worse than words can tell,
Yet it is sweet beyond compare
With such commercial smell.

W. J. LAMPTON

TO a very large proportion of the American people the fact is becoming increasingly apparent that, while we are acclaimed by the whole world as neutrals, we are in reality one of the principal participants in the European strife. By our vast shipments of weapons and ammunition we are assisting materially in keeping up the slaughter. How we can logically claim to be a peace-loving and humane nation, and still supply the means of destroying thousands of human lives, is a problem which the American people must ultimately square with their own conscience.

From time to time the news has been published that certain firms have declined contracts for supplying cannon, rifles, metallic cartridges and shells to European combatants. According to a despatch in the New York Evening Post, the Driggs-Seabury Ordnance Corporation of Sharon, Pa., turned down orders in the first two months of the year from agents of the Russian, French and British Governments for millions of dollars' worth of shells and other war munitions. The president of the company, Mr. John Stevenson, said: "Just as persistently as the orders come in they are rejected. Our corporation will take no part in this business. I am opposed to war on principle. Although this company was established for the purpose of manufacturing the rapid-fire gun, which was turned out in large quantities for years, our policy has changed. I now believe it is far better to make things that are useful to mankind than things that destroy our fellow men, their women and children." But there are others not so scrupulous, who are manufacturing night and day death-dealing materials for use in the battle areas. So immensely profitable is this murderous trade that the appreciation of neutrality and the sense of moral responsibility for results seems to be wholly lost sight of in the haste to profit by the war. A despatch to the Tribune of March 19 from Omaha, Neb., says: "Ten solid train-loads of rifle bullets, in the shape of pig-lead, were started from Omaha today direct to London, where they will be used by the British army. The lead is shipped from the Omaha plants of the American Smelting and Refining Company and aggregates six thousand tons, which will make up into six hundred million rifle bullets of standard size and weight. Each train consisted of twenty cars and each car was loaded with three hundred tons of the lead." On the basis of one bullet in every thousand killing a man, a military observer estimates, this single consignment would be capable of carrying death to six hundred thousand men in the battlefields of Europe.

ALMOST from the beginning of hostilities our war material producing plants have been coining money, at the cost of human lives, at a tremendous rate. From September 1 to December 31, 1914, our exports of war material totaled $49,466,092, being an increase over the same months in the preceding year of $37,751,255. The September increase was slightly over a million, the increase of October was $6,973,964, the November increase $12,554,957, and the December increase $17,209,495. The figures for January and February of the current year are not available, but it is known that they maintain the rising ratio.

In its issue of March 4, the New York World gives an amazing description of the martial activities of the plants in the industrial communities of western Pennsylvania, eastern Ohio and West Virginia, known collectively as the "Pittsburg district." No sooner had the war begun than these plants sprang into sudden activity, working double and triple shifts and continually increasing their forces until it is estimated that not less than 150,000 men are now employed in turning out war orders.

Among the war material turned out in enormous quantities by these steel and iron works, according to the World, are:

Cartridges	Pig lead for bullets
Shells	15-inch guns
Rifles	Submarines
12-inch guns	Bayonets
Barbed wire	Shrapnel steel

One company has a contract for $1,500,000 worth of steel; another a contract for entrenching tools; another for 34,000 tons of cartridge clip steel; another for 3,000 detonator steel, and for 18,000 tons of shrapnel steel and 3,000 tons of angles and shapes. Other contracts are for 5,000 tons of barbed wire; 5,000 tons of reinforcing steel; 5,000 tons of steel for bayonets; 100,000 brass caps for shells, besides contracts for steel rivets and finishing on shrapnel bodies. One leading company, according to the World, has an order for war material received from either France or England amounting to $20,000,000. Another very large concern has an order for 1,000,000 three-inch shrapnel shells and 20,000,000 cartridge discs. It is said that one man alone, by personal visits and through agents, has obtained contracts from foreign governments amounting to not less than $40,000,000.

IN CONCLUDING its presentation of the subject the World says: "Shipments abroad are made through Canada, by which most of the arms and ammunition goes, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Galveston, New Orleans and the Pacific Coast. Yet the steamers sailing from the port of New York alone in two months carried the enormous total of $43,858,500 worth of distinctive war material, consigned only to French and English ports."

There was a bill before the late Congress, providing for an arms embargo, but it came to nothing for the reason given by U. S. Senator Moses E. Clapp (Minn.) in a letter to one of his correspondents, in which he said: "The spectacle of the United States sending shiploads of food and clothing to the orphaned and widowed people of Europe, and at the same time sending shiploads of guns and ammunition to make more widows and orphans, is one of those grotesque contrasts that we sometimes find." And he added: "There is so much money invested in the making and the sale of arms and war munitions that we have simply been powerless to get anywhere with the bill."

Some of the members of Congress have been courageously outspoken in their exposures of this nefarious business, which is sanctioned by our government. Senator La Follette, in a speech in the United States Senate on February 12 on his resolution for an international peace conference, took strong grounds in favor of the "prohibition of the exportation of arms, ammunition, artillery, vessels of war, armor plates, torpedoes or anything used exclusively for military or naval purposes." He added:

"The secretary of commerce reports that in November, 1914, American manufacturers shipped to England cartridges valued at $1,231,285, amounting to 50,000,000 rounds. It is estimated that one soldier is killed or wounded for every thousand rounds fired in battle. Hence, in one year we shipped enough cartridges to kill or wound 50,000 man beings! It is revolting that we should encourage and permit traffic in arms and ammunition for private capital for profit with organized governments, thus prompting selfish interests to influence legislation increasing appropriations in preparation for war and furnishing incentive to intrigue in domestic and foreign affairs to make war for private advantage. It is repugnant to every moral sense that governments could even indirectly be drawn into making and prosecuting a war through the machinations of those who make money out of it."

SENATOR W.S. KENYON of Iowa, the same day, speaking in the Senate, said: "In addition, the cartridges Senator La Follette has spoken of about forty thousand rifles have been used in some ways to keep this war going on. Does not the senator think we had better stop praying for peace, this country as long as we are shipping out these munitions of war for profit?" To this Senator La Follette replied: "Yes, I think it hardly consistent that we should pray for peace and at the same time supply the ammunition to continue the war."

Speaking on the same subject in the House of Representatives Congressman Clyde H. Tanner of Illinois said: "Fortunate indeed would it be for this nation if today the government had a monopoly of the manufacture of munitions of war. It is not the average American, the man who will be required to do the fighting and pay the bills, this country becomes embroiled in war, who is today jeopardizing our peace. If our country becomes involved in the terrible European conflict, the American people have no doubt as to who will be responsible. It is the ring of war-trafficking private arms and ammunition firms who their very minute are endangering the peace and welfare of 100,000,000 American citizens simply in order that they may satisfy their greed for profits."

At the meeting of the New York Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, on March 1, the export of war munitions to the belligerents was discussed and strong ground was taken by one of the speakers in favor of the complete stopping of the infamous traffic in the interest of humanity. His sentiments were applauded by the three hundred clergymen present. A committee of six pastors was appointed to report on "the general sense of the church."

The New York Times of Sunday, March 21, tells of the sailing of six steamships from that port on the previous day laden with guns, ammunition, food and clothing for the Allies, the war material alone worth $2,000,000. No estimate is given of the value of the peace products in the cargo. There was a time when the Christian world was scandalized by the shipments of Bible and rum on the same vessels. Now it is life-saving food and weapons of wholesale murder that mark the hideous contrast. On the decks of one of the steamers were lashed two big 15-inch guns, weighing 73 tons each, consigned from the Bethlehem Steel Works, the Times declares, to Newcastle-on-Tyne. These eloquent evidences of strict neutrality and disinterested Christian charity, going hand in hand, each to counterbalance the other, are very instructive.

This whole question of an avowedly Christian and peaceful nation supplying arms to the combatants in Europe may well occupy the attention of thoughtful Americans. If it be right, what becomes of our humanity? If wrong, who is responsible for it?

MONEY'S MOST MERCIFUL MISSION

THE Christian Herald has just received the first report from Pasteur Charles Wagner of Paris (author of The Simple Life), who was asked to form a Committee in France for the Relief of the Widows and Orphans of the War in Europe. On December 31, ten thousand dollars, equivalent to 51,600 francs, were transmitted to Pasteur Wagner to be used by his committee for the relief work. The report in part follows:

"Forming the committee I first chose a number of Frenchmen who were willing to collaborate with me in the work. They are as follows: M. Pa Favre, manufacturer; M. de Maziarz, merchant; M. Lefevre, secretary of the Federation of Jewelers; M. Alfred Wuntier d'Aggalliers, pastor I then went to the American Embassy and asked to be introduced to Americans who might wish to serve with us. The officials at the embassy courteously directed me to the American Clearing House, where I was well received, and under the auspices of which I made the acquaintance of Miss Ade B. Hyde and Professor J. Mark Bawin. Then, following your suggestion, I called on Dr. Mary Crawford, director of the American Ambulance Hospital. All of these were added to the committee.

Considering that the funds sent by the Christian Herald are exceptional gifts, which will not continue after the war, the committee decided not to engage in the adoption of orphan children or in making pensions for widows and old persons. It will aid orphans and widows and old persons in their first distress, and will see that steps are taken to secure their future by the action of the state, the church and individual effort. It will select the most appalling cases amongst those which will be shown it. Instead of seeking to succor the victims of the war in the great centers and in Paris in particular, it will relieve cases of distress in the localities least provided with agencies of rescue.

"I will be, above all, attentive to the wounds of territory recently freed, and to the regions which are yet occupied by the enemy; certainly it is there that intervention will have the most utility.

"Experience has taught us that or-has to be placed need first of all lotting. We used a part of your lurs to set up a workshop, where vorn out of work, paid by us, will na underclothing and outer garneis which can be more cheaply made y themselves.

THE committee also has given immediate attention to several particularly interesting cases, as follows:

The three Feuilloy children, a boy of 11, a girl eight and a babe of eight months, without father or mother. The father fell on the street, October 29. The mother was taken to hospital January 18, and it was at once necessary to care for the children. Two weeks later the mother died and there was none to take the place of the parents but a poor old grandfather who lived in the Department of the Nord. We have adopted those children provisionally, and will pay for their support until their future is assured.

"Raymond Bioulac, at Choye, Haute Saône. Young man of 18, incapacitated, whom two uncles were supporting. Both are in the army. In the small place where Bioulac lives there is no relief station. Two old persons of 70 were taking care of the unfortunate young man. We are going to help him until his uncles return from the war.

"A very respectable young woman whom we know, and who lived near us a very honest

Europe, now when the climax of misery is approaching? Shall we shut our ears to the cries that grow ever more bitter as the war grows fiercer? Shall we close our eyes to the new wrecking of homes, the new exodus of peoples, the new pitiful companies of terror-stricken refugees, fleeing before the battle as it sweeps through corner after corner of Europe's vast homeland?

and laborious life, has lost her work through the war. She is a modiste. She has been supporting her mother, who is 82 years old, in the commune of Severac (Aveyron). It is a very distressing case. The old lady possessed nothing and receives nothing. We shall attend to her until the young woman finds work.

"My colleagues of the Aisne, of the Marne, of Lorraine, of the Vosges, are notified to let us know of cases of extreme distress. There are persons who have lost their houses and their goods, who are waiting for the spring in order to cultivate their fields and gardens, and in the meantime are obliged to live in wooden barracks until their houses are rebuilt. Especially in those cases where the father was killed in the war, if care can be taken of the widow she may prevent the family from being broken up. In general we do all in our power to prevent the separation of children from the widowed mother.

"We will proceed with caution in order to make the gifts of our American friends attain the maximum of efficiency. May God protect you and bless you together with the Christian Herald, you and your kind readers.

SHALL we cease our efforts to relieve the war-crushed homes of

of the Widows and Orphans of the War, are now coming in and reveal anew the vastness of the need which confronts the Christian world. We never hesitate to lay upon the hearts of Christian Herald readers the burdens of those upon whom calamity has grievously fallen. Your response to the great pitiful cry that came from the broken homes of Europe as the war began its terrible course is a beautiful thing. Today your committees are administering your gifts to thousands of widows and orphans, whose lot would wring your hearts could you see it as your representatives there see it. Last week we published the report from England; on this page is the report from the committee in France. Holland, we think, will be the next country heard from, and then we hope the committee in Vienna will have gotten its first report through to us. It is to Vienna and the district to the east that we wish to call your special attention now.

THOSE who know the peoples of Galicia, their habits and their land, and understand the effect of the war upon their fortunes, agree with observers on the spot that nowhere has war's affliction been more bitter. It is said that Belgium, at the height of its woe, might have ceased its sobbing out of very amazement at the miseries of these poor peasants on the frontiers of Austria and Russia.

Galicia, it is stated, has been almost depopulated. Villagers and farm dwellers alike have been thrust from their homes and forced to flee across the Carpathians into the regions around Vienna, there to accept what haven they could find. For countless numbers death opened the haven. Resistance to their fate was impossible. They became a people without a country, and for a refuge knocked at the door of a house threatened by famine and disease. How they have survived the winter, those hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of paupers, is beyond knowing. But there they are.

They were not paupers until the war made them so. They had been merchants, professional people, teachers, small farmers, laborers, housewives, happy children. There were aged and sickly among them as well. They are a part of a great people whose identity as a nation has long been destroyed. Representatives of the races of Galicia are numerous in the United States and become excellent citizens of this country. But in Galicia they were on their native soil, where for centuries their ancestors had dwelt. But now they are outcasts among the nations and dare not even hope as yet to return to their ruined possessions and start life anew. So there before the door of a house threatened by disease and famine they crouch, a nation in beggary. Little children have had all the play taken from them and all desire for play. Mothers have no incentive of home-keeping to cheer them; their one frantic task is to find food and shelter for themselves and little ones through each slow-dragging day.

Little has yet been done to relieve this terrible situation by the outside world. The Christian Herald has its committee at Vienna, to which it has forwarded funds for use among the destitute Austrians. We are now arranging for the appointment of a sub-committee, located at Vienna, but to work solely among the refugees from Galicia. We shall place ten thousand dollars at work there immediately the arrangements are completed. Would you not wish this were ten times ten thousand dollars? Can you conceive of greater need for your charity than is presented by these hopeless objects of war's soulless course?

WE invite our readers to renew their gifts again and again, so that the Christian Herald Fund, which is entirely for the widows and orphans of the war, may carry into every corner of the devastated portions of the world the mercy and comfort of Christian sympathy and love.

Address all gifts to the Widows and Orphans Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Questions and Answers

W. E. R., Lancaster, Ky. Does a perfect Christian always feel the same? At times I feel happy and can say, so far as I understand, that my sins are all forgiven; I feel that I love everybody, and feel God's Spirit within. Then I get indifferent; I don't wish any one harm, but do not have the same spirit and love within. I have prayed to overcome this and not to have these feelings, but it seems to be a nature I can't overcome. Sin is disgusting, especially wilful sin, and I long to be made whole. I am in bad health and sometimes get irritated with my family when they oppose my wishes or do not seem interested in God's Word.

Suppose we begin, in trying to find an answer for your problems—which could be matched in countless lives—by quoting these words from Paul: "God is able to make all grace abound toward you, that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work." (II Cor. 9: 8.) That's comforting, isn't it? Whatever our problems are, then, we are not going to worry about them, because God's grace is so abundant. Almost every difficulty in life is solved by just getting a little more of God's grace. He is going to take away your anxiety, and make you happy; you can count on him for that. But not even perfect Christians "feel" the same all the time. Another word for feeling is emotion, and that very word implies motion, change, fluctuation. Our feelings are affected by many things—health, sleep (or the lack of it), conditions of the air, etc. You speak of being in bad health, and, especially in cases where nerves are overstrained and the brain overworked, this is very likely to produce depression and oversensitiveness. You hate sin; you love God; you wish everyone well; you long that others shall love God's Word. Now thank God for all the grace he has given you, and ask him for more. Read his wonderful promises of cleansing and believe he means them for you. Then, disregarding your feelings and living actively for others, keep on believing that he keeps his promises for you, moment by moment. See Ezek. 36: 25-27; II Cor. 7: 1; I Thess. 5: 23-24. If you will insert the word "but" between the verse that puzzles you and the verse that follows the meaning will be clear.

"Pencor." Please let me know through the Mail-Bag if it is right to use parts of another's sermon in your own.

Absolutely, no; unless full credit is given. There is no more excuse for stealing another's brain wealth than for stealing his money wealth. It is strange that some preachers seem to have little or no conscience on this point. If one periodical uses material printed in another and protected by copyright, the publishers may be severely punished by law. While a spoken sermon is not copyrighted, it is just as wrong morally to quote orally from it without credit, as it would be to publish quotations without credit from a printed and copyrighted sermon. It is very hard to have patience with speakers or writers who steal their ideas or their phraseology from others. Particularly in religious teaching or discussion is this thing offensive. One can always bear personal witness to the grace of God, and this is more effective than any insincere utterance of another's ideas. Of course it is right to use the sayings and interpretations of others if one gives credit to them for the material used. Or in cases when a certain interpretation is well known as being held by many scholars, one can make such an interpretation without specifying any particular authority. But it is better always to err on the safe side. Go out of your way to give credit to the man who has done the work which you are finding useful.

Constant Reader, Goshen, Va. Your letter is a very unusual one, from the fact that it plainly avows that you, a professing Christian, have contemplated a course which is both un-Christian and unneighborly. It is difficult to accept such a letter in good faith, as the attitude you describe seems to be incomprehensible. Put yourself in the neighbor's place for a moment; he might say with truth and justice: "Here is that neighbor of mine, a professing Christian and active in the work of his church, who is planning so to shut out the light, sunshine and air from my living rooms that my entire property will be injured and its value greatly depreciated. He is building a cottage which he admits he does not need and which he could place to better advantage on another part of his property; but he does this because he dislikes me. I have tried through the law to protect my right, but have failed. What shall I do?" If this were the case, and your neighbor made an appeal to you personally, asking you to "do unto others as you would that they should do unto you," we fail to see how you could justify yourself in refusing to grant his request. Assuming that you have stated the case with absolute fairness in your letter, we repeat that we do not clearly comprehend why, knowing and professing the doctrines of Christianity as you do, you could ever have been in doubt as to the proper course to pursue. Consideration for rights of others is one of the first requisites of Christian character and is the very basis of Christ's teaching, when he said: "Love thy neighbor as thyself." "Neighbor" is in various passages translated "friend," and means one who should be considered not only as a friend but as a relation (Deut. 5: 20). Jesus taught that the people of the whole world are neighbors and that this feeling of neighborly brotherhood should extend even to our enemies.

G. B. C., Waycross, Ga. Where is the reward for our efforts to enlighten, Christianize and educate the Chinese, the Japanese and all the hordes of heathen of the Old World? We have spent billions of dollars trying to make something out of them, fed them in time of famine, helped them in time of pestilence and always our hand is open to their relief. Now we are feeding them while they kill and maim each other.

The carrying out of the "Great Commission"—the preaching of the Gospel to all the world—was the last injunction of the Saviour to his disciples before his ascension. (See Mark 16: 15-20.) This task was handed down by the apostolic church to its successors and it is incumbent upon every professing Christian to carry it on to completion. For his sake, and without a thought of reward in this world, multitudes have given their best energies and their means, and a great number have literally given their lives, dying as martyrs. To the devotion of faithful Christian men and women is due the fact that the Gospel now has its true believers in well-nigh every land, and that heathenism is passing away. Some of the finest Christians of our own day are to be found in lands once heathen and barbarian. Wherever Christianity has penetrated it has carried with it the spirit of Christlike benevolence. Thus we find the "good Samaritans" of Christendom helping the distressed and suffering wherever found regardless of race or creed. Indeed, this benevolence has proved a splendid entering for the Gospel; and in India, China, Japan and elsewhere it has won over to the side of friendship thousands who were formerly the enemies of Christianity.

B. M. F. B., Port Leyden, N. Y. When you are in doubt concerning any amusement, it is a safe rule to apply a very simple test to it by asking yourself these questions: (1) Will it hinder or help my progress in the spiritual life? (2) Will it be a good example to others, or a stumbling-block in their paths, possibly leading them in the wrong direction? It is a familiar argument in behalf of certain amusements that "there is no harm in them"; but the safest and best policy for a professing Christian is to apply the test in such cases. There are so many good, healthful and thoroughly clean amusements that no one need be deprived of recreation, or driven to take up those that are at least doubtful if not positively bad in their influence upon life and character. It is an excellent thing to follow the Scriptural advice and "avoid even the appearance of evil."

Mrs. A. M., Centerville, Iowa. There can be no reasonable objection to making the Lord's house as beautiful and attractive as consecrated art and generous gifts can make it. Solomon's temple was the wonder and joy of the Eastern world. But we always love to think that God regards the heart of man, rather than his surroundings, and that a temple may be found in the humblest of places, if only the true spirit of Christian faith and worship be present. Far better a simple, unassuming church, built by loving gifts and dedicated to the Lord's service free of all burdens, than a great and costly pile, mortgaged to the top of its spires, and imposing cares and responsibilities that might have been avoided.

Mrs. F. F., Liberty, Ill. There are so many passages in the Bible commending the generous heart that one may gather from a comparison of those noted below what may be called the Bible estimate of a model giver: Lev. 25: 35; Deut. 15: 7; Ps. 68: 5; Ps. 10: 14; Isa. 1: 17; James 1: 27; Deut. 14: 29; Deut. 15: 10; Prov. 19: 17; II Cor. 8: 12; Luke 21: 3, 4, etc. He who gives gladly, generously, unostentatiously, with kindness and consideration for the feelings of the recipient; he who gives in His name who gave his life for us and through whom we have the gift of eternal life; who gives expecting no return, not even thanks; who gives that he may have a heavenly treasury instead of accumulating a big bank account here to leave to others when he passes away; who regards his wealth as a stewardship which he must use to the glory of God and the good of his fellow men—he is the model giver. We should not judge others, however, who may have a single great and worthy object in view. Those men and women who enrich the whole world by their gifts to noble causes that advance humanity should not be left out of the category of model givers. We know personally some who devote their means systematically to the support of missions and the spread of the Gospel, or to the reclamation of the fallen, the amelioration of poverty, the cause of the sick, etc. America is rich in model givers of this class.

A cheering letter from E. J. Heurlin, Elgin, Texas, says: "In some manner the Christian Herald has become indispensable to me; it and my Bible are essentials to me. More than twenty-five years ago, in Nebraska, I used to see and read copies of the Christian Herald, for my boyhood chum was a constant reader. Perhaps it may interest you to know that he is now teacher of a missionary school in Liang-yang, China, through the influence, I am sure, of the Christian Herald. Under its influence I attempted a school for our Mexican children. We have forty or fifty in this town of school age and no school. I could continue only two months for lack of support. I am hoping to organize the school again with at least a five or six months' term."

Miscellaneous

C. R., Clymer, N. Y. The initials R. E. C. indicate the Reformed Episcopal Church.

Mrs. C. H. Kresge, Ellensburg, Wash., writes to ask if some reader of this journal will kindly send her a copy of the "Railroad Hymn."

T. B., Stafford, Kan. Write to the Registrar, Columbia University, New York City. There is a professor of the Chinese language on Columbia's faculty, and through him you would doubtless receive the suggestions you desire.

Mrs. G. H. K., West Boylston, Mass. Writers of fiction try to be realistic and hence, no doubt, the frequency of such passages as you mention. They certainly do not add to the attractiveness of a story.

Reader, N. Y. The sermon which appeared in the Christian Herald of February 17 last was preached by Rev. E. P. Pfatteicher, successor of Rev. J. A. Seiss, Church of the Holy Communion, Philadelphia.

G. L., Rogers, N. D. Hugh S. Boyd was the blind tutor of Elizabeth Barrett Browning in her girlhood. She always looked up to him with almost worshipful veneration as the one who had guided her early thoughts and ideals. Their friendship was very beautiful and spiritual.

C. J. K., Wichita, Kan. Your criticism of the statements by the writer in question is a just and proper one; but as there is no probability of agreement among students of the prophecies in Daniel and their application to the present war, we can see no advantage in keeping up the controversy.

E. L. B., Elmira, N. Y. It is folly for any one to claim that, in view of recent European events, Christianity is a failure. Christianity is nowise responsible for the war. If the nations of Europe, or rather the governments of Europe, had been truly Christian the war would never have been begun. The war itself is the strongest possible argument in favor of a return to Christianity on the part of the rulers and people of Europe.

S. L., El Paso, Texas. Under our constitution, complete religious freedom is guaranteed to all. Consequently, Catholics have a right to believe and express their belief without interference from any source. It is when the church of Rome steps out of its proper sphere as a religious organization, and employs its influence in political affairs, that there is legitimate ground for criticism and objection. Such a course is in opposition to the basic American principle of total separation of church and state.

Subscriber, Middleton, Idaho. It seems quite clear that the sect whose beliefs and claims you mention are fanatics. The claim that the seal of God is a visible mark on forehead, hands and feet, and that they themselves constitute the 144,000 mentioned in Rev. 7: 4, seems fanciful and irrational. Their insistence upon celibacy for all is unreasonable and un-Christian. If it is the duty of all to adopt this principle and all were persuaded to adopt it, the human race would at once come to an end. The passages you refer to can only mean that in certain rare and isolated cases God may call one to a single life so that more complete attention can be given to some special work.

Mrs. N. G. M., Newington, Conn. The name of the boy who he'd the basket which contained the loaves and fishes that fed the multitude (John 6: 9) is not given anywhere in the Scripture, but it is said to have been preserved in a tradition of the early Christian times—a period when tradition and legend had far more acceptance than afterward. According to the particular tradition in question the boy's name was Ben Ezra, the son of Marianne, a sister of Philip the disciple. It is, of course, impossible to give any proof of the correctness of such legends, which belong very largely to the age of apocryphal literature.

The Secret

In making pastry, the use of Crisco goes far toward insuring satisfactory results.

Standard ingredients, of course and exact measuring are very necessary.

But, given these, Crisco will produce for you pastry of delicacy and lightness that perhaps you have never known.

CRISCO
For Frying—For Shortening
For Cake Making

Purity is the watchword that guards the manufacture of Crisco.

Digestibility is the token by which it commends itself to the up-to-date housewife.

Economy is the characteristic which insures its welcome in households of moderate means.

Plain Crisco Pastry

1½ cupfuls flour 1 teaspoonful cold water
¾ cupful Crisco (Use level measurements)

Sift flour and salt and cut Crisco into flour with knife until finely divided. Finger tips may be used to finish blending materials. Add gradual sufficient water to make stiff paste. Water should be added sparingly and mixed with knife through dry ingredients. Form lightly and quickly into dough; roll out on slightly floured board, at one-quarter inch thick. Use light motion handling rolling pin and roll from center outward. Sufficient for one small pie.

The uses and advantages of Crisco are described in a cloth-bound book which will be sent you on receipt of five 2-cent stamps. This book also contains a different dinner menu for every day in the year, and 615 recipes gathered and tested in actual cooking by the well-known authority, Marion Harris Neil. A paper edition, without the "Calendar of Dinners" with 215 recipes, will be sent free for the asking. The Procter & Gamble Co., Department: Cincinnati, Ohio.

"THE FORTY DAYS"

BY PASTOR D. H. STEFFENS

THE New Testament records but three appearances of the risen Saviour during the forty days which he spent on earth after his resurrection. There may have been appearances of which no mention is made. It is nowhere said in the Gospels or Epistles that there were none other besides those recorded. The probability is that there were for Luke tells us that the Lord "showed himself alive after his passion by many infallible proofs." If there were any such, they doubtless partook of the character of the manifestation to James, of which we should have known nothing but for the simple reason of its being preserved for us by Paul in his first Epistle to the Corinthians, and which seems to have been of a private and personal rather than a public nature.

Now, why, if his interviews with his followers were so few, his intercourse with them so brief, so broken, so reserved, did Jesus remain on earth so long? Why were so many as forty days of an existence such as his spent in this way? We may ask these questions because their Scriptural answers fit of instruction and comfort for the church, which is awaiting the final appearance of her Lord.

In these appearances our risen Lord shows his disciples and his church what is to be his present relationship to them. They all show us this one thing, the one who arose from the dead, ascended into heaven and sitteth on the right hand of God is "this same Jesus" till they, one and all, are a wonderful comment on his precious promise to his people: "Lo, I am with you always even unto the end of the world."

Though his resurrection our Lord had "entered into his glory," to use, continually and unceasingly, the divine majesty communicated to his human attire. At first thought it would seem that he thereby withdrew himself from his church. But he comes to his people. Instead of merely proclaiming his resurrection through an angel messenger, "he shows himself alive to his passion by many infallible proofs, being seen of them for forty days." "His delights are with the children of men." He is "this same Jesus" still.

He comes to his affrighted disciples as the Son of man, saying: "Handle me and see; for a spirit hath no flesh and bones as ye see me have." He has not assumed a phantom body or put on an appearance as angels do when they visit the children of men. He comes as very man, exalted, glorified, yet "this same Jesus" still. Were he to come in his divine nature we could not endure his presence, for "the glory of God is a consuming fire." He therefore graciously associates himself to us as our brother according to the flesh, as the Godman, our Saviour and our Friend.

He is compassionately tender with his infirmities. He bears with them when they yet believed not for joy and wonderment. He dries the tears of the weeping Mary Magdalene just as he had dried the tears of the widow of Nain. When she, supposing him to be the keeper of the garden, pleads with him to tell her where they have taken the body of her Lord, he reveals himself to her by calling her by name. She recognizes the familiar word and turns to him in an ecstasy of believing love. He hastens to show himself to Peter, who after denying him had gone out into the night weeping bitterly, and whom we even now may imagine as sitting above in the blank despair of remorseful self-reproach. He joins the two sorrowing disciples going to Emmaus on the afternoon of the first Resurrection day and sends them back to the eleven at Jerusalem with the glad tidings of the privilege vouchsafed unto them. Verily, "we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities." He is "this same Jesus" still. "A man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." He hastens to comfort those who mourn and to bind up the broken heart. "A bruised reed shall he not break, and the smoking flax shall he not quench."

Dr. Hanna in his famous "Life of Christ" points out that "in Mary, Peter, and these two disciples, three different varieties of human grief were dealt with." He says: "Mary's was the grief of a grateful and affectionate heart, mourning the loss of one beloved; Peter's was the grief of a spirit smitten with the sense of a great offense committed; the grief of the two disciples was that of men disappointed, perplexed, thrown into despondency and unbelief." The loving Saviour with compassionate tenderness accommodates himself to their several needs, just as he in the days of his public ministry took poor Bartimeus apart from the multitude and used signs to speak with the poor deaf-mute whose healing is recorded by Mark. He is "this same Jesus" still, compassionately tender with the infirmities of his people.

Nor has he forgotten his former state and relationship with them. He speaks of the time "while I was yet with you." He reminds them of the words he had spoken to them of his suffering and death. He is still the great Teacher who "opens their understanding that they might understand the Scriptures," "beginning at Moses and all the prophets, expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself." He is just as tender of the Scriptures as ever he was; just as solicitous that not one word of them should fall to the ground and remain unfulfilled. He says: "Thus it is written, and thus it behooved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day." And so he sends his disciples "to preach repentance and remission of sins among all nations," thus teaching us as he taught them, opening our understanding as he opened theirs.

Oh, he is "this same Jesus" still. His every word and look and gesture shows it. Like Joseph, his heart yearns toward his brethren. They may not immediately recognize him, but he leads them step by step, until they can receive the precious revelation: "I am Joseph." Thus did he speak to Saul of Tarsus on the way to Damascus: "I am Jesus." "This same Jesus"—and that is the great lesson of the Forty Days.

THE CHURCH THAT DOES THE MOST

THE general sentiment of the First Annual Conference on Open-Air Evangelism, recently held in the headquarters building of the National Bible Institute in New York City, resolved itself into these words: "Go where people are and win them what they need; they are in the streets and they need the Gospel." In the opening address, Don O. Shelton, president of the National Bible Institute, uttered a series of convincing epigrams. "If we say we have faith and neglect the great multitudes of our cities, we have fallen short of our declaration. . . . Faith without works is a gold brick. . . . Zeal for the saving of lost souls is the surest evidence of the sincerity of the churches. If the Gospel seed is within our hearts, it will show itself in evangelistic zeal. . . . The church that does the most to get the Gospel to the people outside the church is the church that does the most indoors."

After eight years of organized work, the National Bible Institute is convinced that out-door evangelistic meetings afford the greatest opportunity to reach the multitudes.

"My Tang" Our Chief Chef Says That Won Men to Van Camp's

The sauce in Van Camp's, with its sparkling zest, is due largely to our chef-in-chief. He says, "That's what won the men."

Two others pick out our beans by analysis. They get prime beans, even-sized, beans that won't bake hard. They say this won the men.

Others devised our ovens, where Van Camp's are baked by live steam without touching it. Baked in small parcels—baked for hours at 245 degrees. Baked to mellowness without crisping or bursting. Baked so they easily digest.

They say, "We keep the men."

Our opinion is they do. Men may be won by tang and zest, by mealiness and nuttiness. But they are kept by the fact that Van Camp's digest. They bring none of the home-bean discomfort.

Whatever the reason, men do like Van Camp's. At their clubs and their lunch rooms they get them. Thousands of such places, to please their men patrons, are buying Van Camp's today. They never attempt home baking.

Isn't there, Madam, a suggestion for you? If you are buying the old-style, or baking at home, isn't it possible that many around you are serving a better dish?

Please find out. Find out what the men like. If it isn't Van Camp's, after serving one meal, your grocer will return your money. If it is Van Camp's, get a dozen cans. Think how handy they are. Think what bother they save you.

"GREAT doings—those!" John Pendleton exclaimed, as he folded Jimmy's letter.

"Yes, indeed; fine!" murmured Pollyanna, trying to speak with due enthusiasm.

"And it's tonight, too, isn't it? I'd like to drop in on them about now."

"Yes," murmured Pollyanna again, with still more careful enthusiasm.

"Mrs. Carew knew what she was about when she got Jimmy to help her, I fancy," chuckled the man. "But I'm wondering how Jimmy likes it—playing Santa Claus to half a hundred young women at once!"

"Why, he finds it delightful, of course!" Pollyanna lifted her chin ever so slightly.

"Maybe. Still, it's a little different from learning to build bridges, you must confess."

"Oh, yes."

"But I'll risk Jimmy, and I'll risk wagering that those girls never had a better time than he'll give them tonight, too."

"Y-yes, of course," stammered Pollyanna, trying to keep the hated tremulousness out of her voice, and trying very hard not to compare her own dreary evening in Beldingsville with nobody but John Pendleton to that of those fifty girls in Boston—with Jimmy.

There was a brief pause, during which John Pendleton gazed dreamily at the dancing fire on the hearth.

"She's a wonderful woman—Mrs. Carew is," he said at last.

"She is, indeed!" This time the enthusiasm in Pollyanna's voice was all pure gold.

"Jimmy's written me before something of what she's done for those girls," went on the man, still gazing into the fire. "In just the last letter before this he wrote a lot about it, and about her. He said he always admired her, but never so much as now, when he can see what she really is."

"She's a wonderful woman—Mrs. Carew is," declared Pollyanna, warmly. "She's a dear in every way, and I love her."

John Pendleton stirred suddenly. He turned to Pollyanna with an oddly whimsical look in his eyes.

"I know you do, my dear. For that matter, there may be others, too—that love her."

Pollyanna's heart skipped a beat. A sudden thought came to her with stunning, blinding force. Jimmy! Could John Pendleton be meaning that Jimmy cared in that way—for Mrs. Carew?

"You mean—?" she faltered. She could not finish.

With a nervous twitch peculiar to him, John Pendleton got to his feet.

"I mean—the girls, of course," he answered lightly, still with that whimsical smile. "Don't you suppose those fifty girls love her 'most to death?"

Pollyanna said "yes, of course," and murmured something else appropriate, in answer to John Pendleton's next remark. But her thoughts were in a tumult, and she let the man do most of the talking for the rest of the evening.

Nor did John Pendleton seem averse to this. Restlessly he took a turn or two about the room, then sat down in his old place. And when he spoke, it was on his old subject, Mrs. Carew.

"Queer—about that Jamie of hers, isn't it? I wonder if he is her nephew."

As Pollyanna did not answer, the man went on, after a moment's silence.

"He's a fine fellow, anyway. I like him. There's something fine and genuine about him. She's bound up in him. That's plain to be seen, whether he's really her kin or not."

There was another pause, then, in a slightly altered voice, John Pendleton said:

"Still, it's queer, too, when you come to think of it, that she never married again. She is certainly now—a very beautiful woman. Don't you think so?"

"Yes—yes, indeed, she is," plucked Pollyanna, with precipitate haste. "a—very beautiful woman."

There was a little break at the end in Pollyanna's voice. Pollyanna, just then, had caught sight of her own face in the mirror opposite—and Pollyanna to herself was never "a very beautiful woman."

On and on rambled John Pendleton, musingly, contentedly, his eyes on the fire. Whether he was answered or not seemed not to disturb him. Whether he was even listened to or no he seemed hardly to know. He wavered, apparently, only to talk; but at last he got to his feet reluctantly and said good night.

For a weary half-hour Pollyanna had been longing for him to go, that she might be alone; but after he had gone she wished he were back. She had found suddenly that she did not want to be alone—with her thoughts.

It was wonderfully clear to Pollyanna now. There was no doubt it. Jimmy cared for Mrs. Carew. That was why he was so moody and restless after she left. That was why he had come so seldom to see her, Pollyanna, his old friend. That was why—

Countless little circumstances of the past summer flocked to Pollyanna's memory now, mute witnesses that would not be denied.

And why should he not care for Mrs. Carew was certainly beautiful and charming. True, she was older than Jimmy; but young men had married women far older than she any times. And if they loved each other—

Pollyanna cried herself to sleep that night.

In the morning, bravely she tried to face the thing. She even tried, with a tearful smile, to put it to the test of the glad game. She was reminded then of something Nancy had said to her years before: "If there is a lot of folks in the world that wouldn't have no use for that 'ere game o' your it'd be a pair o' quarrelin' lovers!"

"Not that we're 'quarrelin', o' course," thought Pollyanna, shyly; "but just the same I can be glad he's glad, and glad she's glad too, only—" Even to herself Pollyanna could not finish this sentence.

Being so sure now that Jimmy and Mrs. Carew cared for each other, Pollyanna became peculiarly sensitive to everything that tended to strengthen that belief. And being ever on the watch for it, she found it, as was to be expected. First in Mrs. Carew's letters.

"I am seeing a lot of your friend, young Pendleton," Mrs. Carew wrote one day; "and I'm liking him more and more. I do wish, however—just for curiosity's sake—that I could try to see him before somewhere."

Frequently, after this, she mentioned him casually; and, to Pollyanna, in the very casualness of these references lay their sharpest sting; for it showed so unmistakably that Jimmy and Jimmy's presence were not to Mrs. Carew a matter of course. From other sources, too, Pollyanna obtained plenty of fuel for the fire of her suspicions. More and more frequently John Pendleton "dropped in" with his stories of Jimmy, and of what Jimmy was doing; and always here they were mention of Mrs. Carew. Poor Pollyanna wondered, indeed, sometimes, if John Pendleton could not tell of anything but Mrs. Carew and Jimmy, so constantly was one or the other of those names upon his lips.

SOME HARD KNOCKS

Woman Gets Rid of "Coffee Habit."

The injurious action of coffee on the hearts of many persons is well known by physicians to be caused by caffeine. It is the drug found by chemists in coffee and tea.

A woman suffered a long time with severe heart trouble and finally her doctor told her she must give up coffee, as that was the principal cause of the trouble. She writes:

My heart was so weak it could not do its work properly. My husband would sometimes have to carry me from the table, and it would seem that I would never breathe again.

The doctor told me that coffee was causing the weakness of my heart. He said I must stop it, but it seemed I could not give it up until I was down in bed with nervous prostration.

For eleven weeks I lay there and suffered. Finally husband brought home a box of Postum and I quit coffee and started new and right. Slowly I got well. Now I do not have any headaches, nor those spells with weak heart. I know it is Postum that helped me. The doctor said the other day: "I never thought you would be what you are." I used to weigh 92 pounds and now I weigh 158.

Postum has done much for me and I could not go back to coffee again, for I believe it would kill me if I kept at it. Postum must be prepared according to directions on pkg., then it has a rich flavor and with cream is fine."

too, and they told of Jimmy, and of what he was doing to help Mrs. Carew. Even Jamie, who wrote occasionally, had his mite to add, for he wrote one evening:

"It's ten o'clock. I'm sitting here alone, waiting for Mrs. Carew to come home. She and Pendleton have been to one of their usual socials down to the Home."

From Jimmy himself Pollyanna heard very rarely; and for that, she told herself mournfully that she could be glad.

"For if he can't write about anything but Mrs. Carew and those girls, I'm glad he doesn't write very often!" she sighed.

CHAPTER XXVI

THE DAY POLLYANNA DID NOT PLAY

AND so one by one the winter days passed. January and February slipped away in snow and sleet, and March came in with a gale that whistled and moaned around the old house, and set loose blinds to swinging and loose gates to creaking in a way that was most trying to nerves already stretched to the breaking point.

Pollyanna was not finding it very easy these days to play the game, but she was playing it faithfully, valiantly. Aunt Polly was not playing it at all—which certainly did not make it any easier for Pollyanna to play it. Aunt Polly was blue and discouraged. Nor was she well, and she had plainly abandoned herself to utter gloom.

Pollyanna was still counting on the prize contest. She had dropped from the first prize to one of the smaller ones, however; Pollyanna had been writing more stories, and the regularity with which they came back from their pilgrimages to magazine editors was beginning to shake her faith in her success as an author.

"Oh, well, I can be glad that Aunt Polly doesn't know anything about it, anyway," declared Pollyanna to herself bravely, as she twisted in her fingers the "declined-with-thanks" slip that had just tumbled in one more shipwrecked story. "She can't worry about this—she doesn't know about it!"

All of Pollyanna's life these days revolved around Aunt Polly, and it is doubtful even if Aunt Polly herself realized how exacting she had become, and how entirely her niece was giving up her life to her.

It was on a particularly gloomy day in March that matters came, in a way, to a climax. Pollyanna, upon arising, had looked at the sky with a sigh—Aunt Polly was always more difficult on cloudy days. With a gay little song, however, that still sounded a bit forced, Pollyanna descended to the kitchen and began to prepare breakfast.

"I reckon I'll make corn muffins," she told the stove confidentially; "then maybe Aunt Polly won't mind—other things so much."

Half an hour later she tapped at her aunt's door.

"Up so soon? Oh, that's fine! And you've done your hair yourself!"

"I couldn't sleep. I had to get up," sighed Aunt Polly, wearily. "I had to do my hair, too. You weren't here."

"But I didn't suppose you were ready for me, auntie," explained Pollyanna, hurriedly. "Never mind, though. You'll be glad I wasn't when you find what I've been doing."

"Well, I shan't—not this morning," frowned Aunt Polly perversely. "Nobody could be glad this morning. Look at it rain! That makes the third rainy day this week."

"That's so—but you know the sun never seems quite so perfectly lovely as it does after a lot of rain like this," smiled Pollyanna, deftly arranging a bit of lace and ribbon at her aunt's throat. "Now, come. Breakfast's all ready. Just you wait till you see what I've got for you."

Aunt Polly, however, was not to be diverted, even by corn muffins, this morning. Nothing was right, nothing was even endurable, as she felt; and Pollyanna's patience was sorely taxed before the meal was over. To make matters worse, the roof over the east

THE FLOWER SHOW

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

BUT you'll have a—beautiful time," said the Comforting One, as I climbed into my coat and hat, "the Flower Show will be wonderful; think of the colors of them—the fragrance."

I sniffed disconsolately. A bad cold in the head is not very conducive to good temper and sweetness of disposition.

"No matter how fragrant they are," I murmured hoarsely, "I won't be able to smell them!"

The door closed gently behind me.

DURING my work in New York I have flattered myself that I knew the city rather well. I have wandered joyously along obscure East Side streets; I have walked with lifted chin past the homes of millionaires; and, being fortunate, I have always found my way to the desired place.

Perhaps having a cold dulled the brain of me; perhaps I was just naturally stupid; but, going to the Flower Show at the Grand Central Palace, I lost my way. There was no excuse, for I have often been there; but somehow I found myself changing cars wildly and dashing down side streets and creeping in bewildered circles. Finally, after much worrying, I found myself standing on the corner of Fourth Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street, very much bewildered.

Somehow, when I have been troubled, or worried, or lost, there has always been a providential person to help me out. As I stood on the corner, uncertain as to my next move, I saw a lady who looked very kind, coming down the street. She was dressed in brown and wore brown furs, but it was the sweetness of her face that made me step up to her side.

"I wonder," I asked, "if you can tell me where to find the Grand Central Palace."

The lady looked at me keenly—then she smiled.

"You're going to the Flower Show, aren't you?" she asked. "Well, so am I! We'll go together."

Somewhere, I think, there is a special heaven just like the Flower Show. As I walked up the wide steps I forgot that I had a cold, that I had lost my way, even that the kind lady was still with me. A mass of color that was in some spots as vivid as flame, in others as cool as the depths of a great wood, met my gaze on every side. A group of pale pink, blue and pearly white hydrangeas stood out like some Dresden shepherdess, dainty yet healthy looking.

I walked around, drinking in the wonders on every side. There was a lovely booth with wicker porch-baskets, and tiny cut-out wooden birds to place among the flowers; there were huge palms, and great feathery masses of fern; there were tiny Japanese gardens with miniature lakes and unbelievably small fir trees; there were lilies and carnations and—roses.

Roses—they were everywhere, growing on bushes, and in heavenly sweet clusters that filled innumerable jars.

As I walked along, fascinated, peering at rows of them, I suddenly found myself between two gardens that were carefully planned bits of beauty. One was a tiny plot of green grass and climbing roses. Quaint walks of flagstones ran between round beds and bors. The other was more elaborate, for there were small lattice frames covered with blossoms, and even a tiled fountain that splashed beneath a huge bush. The predominating color was pink and the walks were narrow ones filled with white pebbles.

For a moment I had lost my kind lady in the ever changing throng. Next as I turned a corner, I heard her voice speak softly in my ear.

"Today," she told me, "the hotels are having a table-decorating contest. They offer a huge silver cup worth a hundred dollars to the best table." Under her direction I turned a corner and walked into the midst of a superb room.

The tables were very beautiful. There were tiny artificial lakes with white wax swans floating on them; there were small fountains under brilliant hidden electric lights, and there were chubby Kewpie dolls standing in bowers of daffodils. Everywhere I saw gold plate that was famous and crystal cut with fairylike delicacy.

It was a surprise to me, rather a pleasant surprise, to find the silver cup resting on the simplest table—the table that had the least heavy plate and silver on it. The decorations consisted of a star-shaped centerpiece of yellow acacia blossoms, and very pale pink sweet peas, with a tall slender vase of them in the middle. There was a vague touch of blue in the glass and china. . . .

HERE I am almost at the end of my article and I haven't told you if enough. I haven't spoken about the glorious "peace" carnation, white as any dove, that bloomed beside the blood-reddest roses; and I haven't told you about the "Polish Tea-Party" that was packed, sardine-tight, with fashionable folk, and hungry folk, and debutantes in peasant costume. I haven't even told you about the tiny plot of shamrocks, or the pretty little in floppy garden hats and fascinating linen smocks, who sold flowers.

Somehow, I always have to hurry away for a train. I felt, as I saw a hurried good-by to the kind lady as Cinderella might have felt as she left the ball-room at the stroke of twelve.

Some day, perhaps, if I ever have a rich fairy godmother, I shall make a flower show of my own. And, when I do, I will throw the gates open wide and give a party to street children who have never seen the greenness of grass, and folk who have to hurry for trains, and kind ladies.

As I left the doorway I smiled faintly; and then, all at once, I realized that I could smell a heavenly fragrance.

My cold was better.

GIFTS IN SECRET

THE following interesting letter was recently received by the Christian Herald, and has been attended to in the manner indicated below. These are precious trusts committed to us, many of them in the course of the years, and we count it a great privilege to make distribution of such gifts. The letter, which is self-explanatory, follows:

Please find enclosed draft for six hundred dollars, of which amount send three hundred dollars to foreign missions and the rest to the War Famine Fund, or wherever it is most needed, in your opinion. We have been pleased with the distribution of money which we have sent you before. Please do not publish our names.

This letter is signed by a good friend and his wife and the amount enclosed has been apportioned as follows:

Why you should consider the Chalmers

If you believe in looking well before you leap—if you belong to that practical class which desires to know fully about any proposition before investing—then there is much in this advertisement that will appeal to your common sense.

If you are going to buy a motor car this spring a careful reading of what is written will be of invaluable assistance in enabling you to establish values.

Consider the Company Behind the Cars

There are a number of unimpeachable reasons why you should consider the three Chalmers Sixes—the New Six-40 at $1,400—the Light Six-48 at $1,650—and the Master Six-54 at $2,400.

The first is the company itself. For seven years the Chalmers Motor Company has been building motor cars ranked first among the medium-priced cars in America.

For two years Chalmers Sixes have led all medium priced Sixes in volume of sales. Over 40,000 Chalmers cars are now in actual operation.

This success must be ascribed to the fact that the American people do appreciate quality—and that they find it—in superlative measure—in Chalmers Sixes.

The 7,500 to 10,000 cars we now build each year are sold to people who believe in buying quality as sound business practice—who cannot be touched by the temptations of a slightly cheaper price.

Chalmers Sixes Are Chalmers Built

To keep our faith with Chalmers owners—to make absolutely certain that our standards never deviate—we manufacture every essential part of every Chalmers car in our own great plant.

We build our motors, transmissions, axles—practically everything that becomes part of the finished car.

This policy results in many manufacturing efficiencies and economies favorable to the purchasers of Chalmers cars.

For instance—by buying in quantities sufficient for our year's output we get rock bottom prices. Our financial strength enables us to discount every bill. The high development of our organization of over 4,000 men enables us to attain many economies in labor and time. And because we are in business to stay we have ever been content with a small margin of profit per car—in fact, less than that taken by many companies selling cars priced at half our prices.

We have never lost a sale to anyone who has gone through our shops and seen Chalmers cars in the making. We feel very certain in saying that you, too, would be content only with a Chalmers Six could you but visit this plant.

Expert mechanics—men of the highest standing in their particular field—have told us that the Chalmers plant is the best equipped automobile factory in the country. Some of the labor saving machinery we have is exclusively Chalmers—invented by our own men.

Chalmers Sixes Are Never Over-Priced

We have never priced them with a view to allowing our dealers such a large discount that they, in turn, could make larger discounts for old cars. The prices of our cars are based upon their being sold for cash—not upon the basis of taking old cars in trade.

A mistake often made by buyers is to allow the amount they may get for the old car to outweigh the consideration of the new car.

First decide if the price of the new car you want is right—then get what you can for your old car.

If you have an old car to trade in, our dealers will allow you whatever the market is on the old car.

It is better for you to accept less for the old car and get a car of Chalmers quality and value than to take a new car of less real value—a car originally overpriced to enable a big allowance—and accept a larger allowance.

Our dealers are always glad to give you all they can get for your old car and not charge you anything for disposing of it.

Another thing to get clear in your mind before deciding on any car is its real price.

After all the real price of any car is not what you pay when you get it but what you pay while you have it—the upkeep cost for service.

The car of expensive upkeep cost is the real high-priced car.

Figured this way Chalmers cars are the lowest-priced cars—for they are most economical cars where economy counts big—in the matter of repairs. Their cost for service season after season is lowest.

Here's Why Chalmers Sixes Are So Economical

A good deal has been said about what is and what is not motor car economy. You may have been told that it is in oil saving or in gasoline saving. But such saving isn't real economy although both are desirable. For oil is a negligible expense and there is little difference in a season's gasoline cost between any two cars of similar size and power on the market.

It's your repair bill that determines the real cost of your car. For one repair bill is often large enough to wipe out a season's saving in oil and gasoline. Consequently saving of repair bills is the big economy. And Chalmers are built so well that they rarely need attention, adjustment or replacement of parts.

Chalmers cars are noted for their ability to "stay put"—to "stand up" under the hardest driving conditions and still keep "sweet" running. Their repair bills are kept at the lowest notch.

There are—in the main—four reasons why Chalmers cars have such marked superiority in strength and stamina.

First—their construction is right. The basic principles of their design are correct. Strains and stresses that—if not provided against—will eventually tear a car, under hard service, to pieces have been eliminated.

Second—the weight of Chalmers cars is right. Not too light—for an underweight car is necessarily flimsy. And a flimsy car quickly succumbs to road punishment.

Too light weight in a motor car is worse than overweight. Think that over. Too light weight is worse than overweight.

Third—Chalmers cars have proper balance. The load is proportioned with marvelous engineering skill.

The rear axle carries just the right amount. The front axle—drop forged and of great strength—is not overburdened.

Moving parts are adjusted with absolute accuracy. The most delicate instruments known to science—measuring to 1-1000 of an inch—establish the trueness of alignment of parts.

The racking of parts and pounding of pistons that will so quickly disable a car have no chance to develop in a Chalmers car.

And because of the perfect distribution of weight—the perfect balance—of Chalmers cars the wear on tires is at the minimum.

Fourth—the materials put into Chalmers cars are of top quality. A special corps of inspectors—trained to detect the most minute flaws—make it absolutely certain that only unblemished materials of highest grade enter our stockrooms.

Makers of steel and automobile accessories will tell you that no company is more exacting in its requirements—that no company has stricter standards.

For instance—the frame construction is of pressed steel—the transmission gears are 3½% of nickel steel—exhaust valves are of Tungsten steel—the piston rings are formed of a very high grade of tempered steel spring.

Throughout Chalmers cars—in the big and little details of both finish and construction—the "Quality First" idea in workmanship as well as material is rigidly maintained.

Yet—there are other features besides the notable one of repair economy that will interest you in Chalmers cars.

Chalmers Sixes Have the Beauty of Class

Few costly cars can claim equality with them in beauty. The streamline body possesses a distinctive grace of line that makes it noteworthy even when contrasted with the finest foreign models.

There are no fenders built—whether flat or merely crown—that are as handsome as the Chalmers molded oval fenders. They conform with exquisite harmony to the clean-cut sweep of the body lines.

The doors are wide and flush-fitting. The running boards are clear. The tires are carried in the rear. Compare Chalmers cars point by point, detail by detail, with any others selling within several hundred dollars of their prices, and the greater value of the Chalmers will be quite apparent.

We haven't depended upon our own car alone to tell us whether or not we are right; we have bought and have driven almost every make of car in the medium priced field, so that we could have the chance of comparing the Chalmers with these cars.

Someone said that there isn't a bigger fool than the man who fools himself. We didn't want to fool ourselves. So we learned what our competitors' cars are from actual experience with these cars.

These are just a few of the reasons why you ought to consider the Chalmers in your purchase this spring. After all, it is to your interest more than ours, because if you don't buy a Chalmers car, we will make one less sale—and we shall probably oversell our output anyhow this spring; but if you don't buy a Chalmers car, and don't get the same high grade qualities the Chalmers possesses, you are the loser for a year or two or five years of service. We of course want to sell cars, but we don't want to sell cars on misrepresentation.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

One Day in Seven for the Highest Things

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topic for April 18. Ezek. 20: 1-20.
(Sabbath observance meeting)

JESUS gave the world much new light upon the Sabbath. People had thought the Sabbath an institution God had established for his own pleasure, that its observance was something which in some mysterious way pleased or benefited him. Jesus put it the other way about. "The Sabbath was made for man." God wanted man to be assured of a chance to think and worship and relax and recreate his strength, so he made the Sabbath "for man."

Work is good, but too much work is bad. It dulls the eye and deadens the brain and wears the soul. Read Edwin Markham's "Man with the Hoe," and feel again how unrelieved drudgery brutalizes a man who was meant to be like God. Read Jack London's description in "Martin Eden" of the soul-deadening, mind-destroying results of overstraining at dull and difficult physical labor. It occurs in the chapter in which the writer narrates his experiences as a hotel laundryman. Many people are overtired all the time. Americans work too hard and too fast. We need the Sabbath. We need Christ's gracious invitation to weary folk to accept his rest for our souls and to learn how to toil restfully, because toiling with him and for him.

The church has a definite duty to perform to relieve the worker from too burdensome conditions, so that he may have time and mental strength and physical energy left from his toil to think the highest thoughts and develop such a soul as a creature should have who was made to be the companion of God.

Seizing One's Chance to Save Another

Epworth League Topic for April 18.
Acts 16: 25-34; Luke 23: 42, 43

A BUSINESS man has a definite amount of territory to cover in a day, a definite number of men to see. He does not consider he has done a day's work until he has filled this schedule.

We sing: "One More Day's Work for Jesus," but how much of our work is really done for him? Are we definitely trying now to lead certain definite people to Jesus and giving definite time to doing it? Opportunities are missed every day. We need to care more. We need to plan more; then we need to carry out our plans resolutely and regularly, trusting the power and wisdom of Christ to help us in leading people to him.

In the incidents forming our Scripture lessons two men were in prison, the third man was being executed. These circumstances might be thought to excuse one from trying to win souls; but they thought otherwise. Read the wonderful story of the "Miracle at Moundville," found in the Christian Herald for February 24, March 3, 10 and 17.

THREE VISITS TO THE BOWERY MISSION

BY REV. J. GREGORY MANTLE

SINCE I have been in America, I have visited missions in New York, Chicago, Cleveland, Columbus, Dayton and other cities. The first impression made upon me in my visits to the Bowery Mission was the large number of men in attendance at the meetings. In several other places I have been impressed with the scarcity of men, and consequently the small output for an expensive plant. The chapel at the Bowery, so admirably adapted for its purpose, has been filled on each occasion.

If you are shooting at a small covey of birds, you may miss; but if you are firing into a large flock, you are pretty sure to hit something. From a long experience of such work as that which my friend, Dr. Hallimond, is doing, I think the strongest proof of its success is that he has such a crowd of men always present at the meeting.

The second impression has been the attention, interest, and responsiveness of the men. Of course, in such a crowd of storm-tossed, wave-battered men, there were some who could not resist the temptation to sleep; but they had probably been out all night, and the warmth and comfort of the Bowery Mission were too much for them. I always felt sorry when the "wakers-up" nudged these men and aroused them to a brief attention.

I have tried on each occasion to preach the Gospel which, it seemed to me, these poor fellows needed most. Two thoughts have been always in my mind: first the marring, disintegrating, destructive power of sin, and the possibility of being made over again by the Lord Jesus—the Gospel of the second chance; and second, the necessity of removing from the minds of these men the hard thoughts of God which Satan loves to inject and encourage.

On my last visit I told them a story of the late Charles Garrett of Liverpool, one of the most successful workers in this difficult field of service. He had invited to a midnight supper all the thieves, burglars and blackguards he could find in the lowest part of Liverpool. Two of his guests were conversing under the light of a street-lamp when the supper was over. Suddenly and stealthily a policeman came upon them with the peremptory question, "What are you doing here?" "We have been to Charles Garrett's supper," said one of the men, who was a notorious criminal. "Fudge!" said the policeman. "You don't fool me with that stuff." "Indeed we have," said the men in concert. "Then," said the man in blue uniform, "if you have been to Charles Garrett's supper, you can tell me something he has told you." "Why," said one of the men, "he told us that God was love, that God actually loved us. We always thought that God was a great policeman, following us up, and only waiting for a chance to run us in." "All right, boys," said the policeman. "You've been there, right enough. Good night!"

Through the kindness of Dr. Hallimond, I have been able to meet the men who stood at the close of the sermon, expressive of their determination to lead a new life, in a room by themselves. There were between thirty-five and forty on one occasion, and twelve at my last visit. That gave me the opportunity of further instruction, and a fuller insight into the character of the men. On my last visit, for example, there were three or four bright young men among the twelve who met me for a few moments at the end of the meeting. I found two of them were stewards of ocean liners, one from Liverpool, and another from Southampton. They had played the fool, had lost their berths, and had found their way to the Bowery. To see the determined look in their faces, to listen to their confession of folly, and to know they were leaning on a strong arm for salvation and help, was a joy which only those who have experienced it can understand.

Dr. Hallimond told me of the new farm project, and of all that is being done to restore to these men their lost self-respect. Who is there who cannot rejoice when the vessel marred by sin is made over again by the Great Potter, who bids us "do good to all men, despairing of none?"

Stop! Read this. It means money saved to you. It means better, cleaner heat. And please remember that all this comfort and saving is guaranteed—guaranteed the Williamson New-Feed UNDERFEED way. It is but one instance among thousands of such others that we can show you:

"The year before my UNDERFEED was installed, my house was heated with an Overfed Furnace of so-called 'standard' make. My coal, year before last, cost me from $3.00 to $3.25 a ton; the bill for the winter ran almost $90.00, and during that winter only about half of my house was heated as a house should be.

"Last winter the same house was heated with one of your UNDERFEED Furnaces. The coal used was 'Slack,' which cost me $1.50 per ton; the bill for the entire winter ran about $35.00. The house was comfortably heated every day of the winter, including windy days.

"A comparison of those two years has convinced me of the superiority of your UNDERFEED Furnace."

Yours respectfully, (signed) H. Ernest Hutton, 401 Baum Bldg., Danville, Ill.

The "Candle" Principle

The New-Feed UNDERFEED operates on the "candle" principle. Coal is fed from below. Hot, clean coals and flame are always on top in direct contact with most effective radiating surfaces. In passing up through the live fire, all smoke, gases and dirt are consumed and utilized in the form of clean heat. They can't go up the chimney and be wasted as in top-fed heaters.

Burns Cheaper Grades of Coal

And the New-Feed UNDERFEED burns the cheaper grades of coal—a first great tangible saving. And the New-Feed is so simple that a boy of 12 can operate it with as good results as when the fire is in charge of a professional "furnace tender." Adapted to warm air, steam or hot water.

Learn More About It

Send the attached coupon. Remember the 50 per cent saving in coal bills is guaranteed where the New-Feed is properly installed and operated. The coupon brings you, free, the interesting book "From Overfed to Underfed" which describes the New-Feed's simple operation. Sending the coupon costs you nothing—places you under no obligation. AMERICAN WOMEN AND THE WAR

WE HAVE received from the Organization of American Women for Strict Neutrality a printed form of protest against the exportation of arms and munitions of war, which we reproduce below. Copies of this protest with ruled places for signatures can be obtained from Miss N. L. Miller, Roland Avenue, Roland Park, Md., upon request, and it is the hope of the organization that women all over the United States will obtain the forms, procure signatures and send the completed documents back to Miss Miller for presentation to the President. It is equally in order to copy the form as printed below upon any suitable paper, secure signatures with full name, city and street address and mail as above. The form follows:

Organization of American Women for Strict Neutrality

WE THE undersigned, citizens of the United States, unite in earnest protest against the exportation from this country of arms, munitions and all contraband of war for the use of nations engaged in the present conflict—for humanitarian reasons—basing our protest on international law and precedent, as follows: Woolsey International Law: "If the neutral, instead of wheat, should send powder or balls, cannon or rifles, this would be a direct encouragement of the war, and so a departure from the neutral position."

"On January 23, 1871, long after the Franco-Prussian War had begun, President Grant signed an embargo on arms. The result of this was that the war was settled within a few months and the shedding of much blood was prevented."

"President Taft in 1912 issued a proclamation forbidding the export of arms and munitions to Mexico."

"In 1913 President Wilson placed an embargo on munitions of war to Mexico."

"The British Government has a law on its statute books, conferring discretionary power on the king of England to forbid the export of arms and ammunition. On April 23, 1898, at the time of the Spanish-American War, that government warned British subjects against unneutral acts, among which were enumerated the supplying of arms, ammunition, military stores or materials."

"During the Spanish-American War the German Government stopped the sale of arms and munitions of war to Spain."

"At this time every neutral country, except the United States, has placed an embargo on munitions of war."

Beside all this, we have President Wilson's own declaration of neutrality: "We must be neutral in fact as well as in name, and we must put a curb on every transaction which might give a preference to one party in the struggle over another."

Your signature will help stop this war.

What My Pupils Say:

"Every one notices the change in my complexion. It has lost that yellow color."
"Just think what you have done for me. Last year I weighed 216 lbs., this year 146, and have not gained an ounce back. I am not wrinkled either. I feel so young and strong, no rheumatism, or stiff joints. I can breathe now, too. It is surprising how easily I did it. I feel 15 years younger."

"Just think! I have not had a pill or a cathartic since I began, and I used to take one every night."

"My weight has increased 30 lbs. I don't know what indigestion is any more, and my nerves are so rested! I sleep like a baby."

"Miss Cocroft, I have taken off my glasses and my catarrh is so much better.
Isn't that good?"

"I feel as if I could look every man, woman and child in the face with the feeling that I am growing—spiritually, physically and mentally.
Really I am a stronger, better woman. I don't know how to tell you or to thank you."

THE SHEPHERD PSALM

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR APRIL 18.
PSALM 23

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want." Ps. 23: 1.

This is the Nightingale Psalm. An idyl of almost peerless beauty. The experiences of the psalmist's boyhood are set to music with the perfect art of his mature manhood. He tells us that just as sheep look to their shepherd for everything, and are lost indeed without him, so we shall find everything in God, and God will supply all our need out of his fulness in glory. The psalm naturally divides itself into two parts. First shepherd and sheep; second, host and guests. God is our Shepherd during life's chances and changes, and will be our Host forever. We shall not want any good thing, not because we are clever, prudent, and provident, but because God is God to us. When we need food and rest, for body, soul, or spirit, he will provide. When we are faint and sick at heart, he will be at hand to restore. When we are uncertain as to our path, it is for him to guide aright. When the valley is dark, he has a club for the beast of prey, and a hooked crook to extricate us from the pit. The Shepherd is in front, and his two watch-dogs Goodness and Mercy guard the rear. Our enemies may hate us, but they cannot hinder the feast or the anointing oil. "Pure psalm, enter into my soul. Thou the breath and I the lungs; thou the blood and I the veins."

Eastern Sheep and Shepherds

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

STURDY shepherds, silly sheep, and silent Syrian stars.

I never saw or heard of a weak or sickly shepherd. One of the oldest occupations in the world, it has never lacked strong, sturdy, fearless men, who face the wind and storm and cold, the dangers of robbers by night and the ravages of wild beasts at all seasons of the year. I have watched a shepherd guarding his flock at night, dressed in his heavy sheepskin coat, never lying down, but leaning on the heavy staff he carried in his hand. He did not sleep, because at intervals of a minute or less he would raise his head and give a peculiar reassuring call to the flock under his care and his faithful dog at his feet.

No animal could possibly be more helpless than a sheep. The shepherd leadeth, restoreth, guideth the helpless, silly creature, who can do absolutely nothing for itself. Men have trained dogs, goats, horses, but no one ever saw a sheep perform the simplest trick. When attacked by a dog or wild animal the sheep stands chilled by fear while the fleece is torn from his back and the bleeding flesh from his bones.

One of our older missionaries, Rev.
William Bird, visited a sheepfold in Lebanon. It was a strongly built enclosure of uncut stones, whose walls were made doubly secure by closely packed rows of dense thorn above the top row. Its doorway was low and just wide enough for the sheep to enter one by one. The doorway lacked a door and had nothing of any sort to close it. Mr. Bird asked the reason for this strange sight even in this land. The shepherd laid his hand proudly on his breast and answered,
"I am the door; whoever enters must pass over my body."

No words can ever exaggerate the peculiar beauty of the heavens in the midnight Syrian sky. The horizon is so clear that the stars appear above it with a flash like the turning on of an electric light and disappear without any dimming of their brightness as they approach the horizon. Now the shepherds were the pioneer astronomers, and their acute vision in the desert atmosphere makes their eyesight appear almost miraculous when compared with that of the city men whose vision has been dulled for generations by the printed page and by brilliantly lighted cities, where night is turned into day and gas and electricity conceal the beauties of the starry heavens.

The Shepherd Psalm

By Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell

THE psalmist, resting on one of the sunny slopes where shepherds watched their flocks, thought how he had been delivered from the lion and the bear as he led his flocks along the ridges of Bethlehem, of his triumph over Goliath and of his deliverance from the javelins of Saul. As these strains of emotion swept over the harp of his soul, he touched the chords of melody which have echoed God's care and comfort in every portion of the earth.

"The Lord is my Shepherd" is like the music of angels. It expresses personal appropriation of the divine.
He is not a far-off Shepherd. "Thou art near, O Lord." "I shall not want" is the shortest sentence for the longest wealth ever penned. It is a draft upon unsearchable riches. It is a promise that never goes to protest, a bridge over the river of death, a motto over the gates of Paradise.

"He maketh me to lie down in green pastures." David is taking an enforced vacation, being throneless and homeless. He hears the Shepherd's voice saying, "Come apart with me and rest awhile. Peace, be still."

"He leadeth me beside the still waters." These are the deep waters of his love. The sheep cannot drink in swift waters, so the shepherd finds an eddy, or builds a pool "where quiet waters flow."

"He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness." Or, in right ways, not in the bypaths that Bunyan's pilgrim took, but in the highway of holiness.

"He restoreth my soul." When Peter was restored the Good Shepherd asked him to feed the lambs and the sheep. Peter's activity as an under-shepherd ever afterward led many where there is one fold and one shepherd. After David's restoration, sinners were converted and words were written that have inspired millions to enter the kingdom of the Master.

"Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me."
Comradeship with Christ casteth out the fear of death. Death is only a shadow with Christ behind it. There are shadows in life which are long vanishing; shadows of shame, sin, illness, disappointment and bereavement, but in all these we can exclaim: "Thou art with me; I will fear no evil."

"Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." When the sheep are too near a precipice the shepherd applies his crook; when the flock is in danger from attack by a beast of prey, he uses the rod as the weapon of protection.

"Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies." The sheep have enemies, such as poisonous plants, snakes, wild beasts and robbers. David's enemies are pursuing him, but a great blessing has come to his soul. He is feasting at the King's banquet; his banner over him is love.
A glorious vision is before him; he will again sit upon the throne of his kingdom. He is more than conqueror through his Lord; his head is anointed with the oil of a divine baptism and the cup of his soul runneth over with love. He beholds the angels Goodness and Mercy, following him all the days of his life, so that he triumphantly exclaims, "I shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever." There "they shall hunger no more; neither shall the sun strike upon them, nor any heat, for the Lamb, which is in the midst of the throne, shall shepherd them and shall lead them unto fountains of the waters of life."

The touching power of this psalm is in its personal pronouns. Seventeen times David uses the "I's," the "Me's," the "My's" and the "Mine's." Twelve times he speaks of the beloved Shepherd in the "He's," "Thou's" and "Thine's," and other names, making twenty-nine times of these little affectionate expressions out of the one hundred and eighteen words in the entire psalm. It is the Bible in miniature, as the Lord's Prayer is the miniature of all prayers. No theory of theology is presented in this matchless mosaic, yet the Christian's faith is here pictured in condensed loveliness. It is the portrayal of a lost lamb, embraced in the bosom of the shepherd. It is the language of absolute certainty, not speculation, far more than hope; it is real enfoldment, conscious security, rest in everlasting arms. It is the soul's ultimatum to doubt, fear and unbelief. It is blessed reality, known fact and abiding presence.

The Lord is my shepherd, no want shall I know.
I feed in green pastures, safe-folded I rest;
He leadeth my soul where the still waters flow,
Restores me when wandering, redeems when oppressed.

LEADERSHIP TRAINING CLASS

Conducted by FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

The Sunday School Librarian

I. REQUIRED STUDY. One of the following books: The Church School (Atheam); The Sunday School Organized for Service (Lawrance); Organizing and Building the Sunday School (Hurlbut); The Organized Sunday School (Axtell); The Efficient Sunday School (Cope); The Sunday School at Work (Faris); The Modern Sunday School (Cope).

II. SPECIALIZATION BOOKS. Modern Methods in Sunday School Work (Mead); Sunday School Reports, Records and Recognitions (Fox); The Sunday School Superintendent and His Work, Chapter 14 (Brown).

III. METHOD MATERIAL. Admittedly the public library and the public school library have very largely taken the place formerly occupied in good measure by the Sunday school library. In many places it is unwise and unnecessary for the Sunday school to compete with such libraries. Rather should there be a spirit of co-operation with them.

In many states the public library co-operates heartily with the Sunday school by sending a scholars' or teachers' traveling library of excellent books, for use for a limited period, these to be replaced by others as required. This diminishes the cost locally and serves the community in a better way than the old plan. The old-style Sunday school library in the large cities is not now used, although by a careful selection of wholesome books Sunday schools in cities are rendering a splendid service. The Halsted Street Methodist Sunday School of Chicago, the Emmanuel Baptist Church Sunday School, Albany, N. Y., and the Baptist Sunday School of Somerville, Mass., have good examples of effective libraries, the latter school maintaining a library of 4,000 books.

There is certainly a field in the Sunday school for a strong missionary library and for a special library for parents and teachers.

1. The Library Committee.

The committee should have a representative from each department of the school. Any book selected should have the O.K. of at least two members of the committee. The books should be selected and added to the library list monthly rather than to add a large number at any one time. This will enable better selection of books. A library appropriation should be made from the school budget at the beginning of the school year, a certain amount to be spent monthly.

2. The Librarian.

Ladies make good librarians. The librarian should know something about each book, and be able to suggest the right book to scholar, parent or teacher, with a few words about the contents, as the title is not always a true index.

3. Library Plans.

The books should be catalogued by departments or ages and, if possible, classed under sections, such as General Reading; Missionary; Officers and Teachers; Parents and Home Department. It would be well if the general reading were subdivided into history, biography, fiction, etc.

The additions to the library should be posted on a bulletin and occasionally mentioned from the platform, with a brief statement of contents.

The simplest library plan is to have a separate vertical compartment for each book, numbered the same as the book. A duplicate card is prepared for each scholar, one card with number of book and date going with the book to the scholar, and the duplicate showing name and date filed in the compartment or in an alphabetically arranged filing rack.

If possible a library room should be provided where young people can come evenings for reading and quiet games. Magazines should be provided for such evenings.

4. Officers' and Teachers' Section.

So many books for the help of Sunday school workers have been produced in the last fifteen years that it is difficult to make the right selection. As the result of inquiries addressed to nearly two hundred Sunday school experts in America the Illinois Sunday School Association, 1414 Mallery Building, Chicago, has prepared a list of seventy-three books on Sunday School History. Management, Organization, Psychology, Pedagogy, Department Problems and Evangelism in five one-foot sections, making a five-foot library in all. The first section is the simpler, and each section contains books for the various workers, so that a school can start with the first section containing eighteen books and costing $10 and can add additional sections as financially able. A simple statement of the purpose of each book is given with the list.

The Methodist Board of Sunday Schools (1018 Wabash Avenue, Chicago) publishes a leaflet of one hundred best books for Sunday school workers. Other denominations issue similar catalogues.

When these books are secured the librarian should place them in the hands of the workers according to department or position in the school, with request that they read and return with a statement of at least one thing they have learned from the book for practical service.

As suggested, the public library will be glad to secure for the use of the workers any good books upon request.

Another plan is to write in the fly-leaf of the book the names of the teachers to whom the book may be of interest, and request that the book be passed on to the next on the list, after reading.

5. Missionary Section.

In the last ten years a missionary library of absorbingly interesting books has been built up. The Missionary Education Movement has assisted largely in this. Every land is brought in this way to the scholar and inspiration provided for missionary giving and consecration to missionary service.

A splendid catalogue of such books, arranged for different ages, has been prepared by Mr. Delavan L. Pierson and published by the International Sunday School Association, Mallery Building, Chicago. Copies can be procured of the State and Provincial Sunday School Associations. The Missionary Education Movement, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York, publish sets of missionary books for Sunday school use. The denominational branches of the Missionary Education Movement also furnish lists.

A good way to introduce missionary books to the attention of scholars is:

(a) To post a sketch of the book and a brief story of the contents.

(b) Telling a few facts to the point of absorbing interest, then tell the scholar to get the book.

(c) A library social with brief papers by the scholars on the books read, with sealed rewards for best papers.

(d) A Sunday school class weekly or monthly gathering at which scholars in turn will read a chapter of the book.

6. Parents and Home Department Section.

One of the new departures of the Sunday school is the formation of libraries for parents. Mothers' associations in connection with the Sunday school sometimes contribute the money for such libraries.

A splendid list of books for such a section of the school library has been compiled by Mrs. W. F. Heath, R. F. D., No. 2, Somerville, N. J. Mrs. Isaac F. Russell, 422 Greene Avenue, Brooklyn, has prepared an excellent list for the Elementary Grades Section of the Brooklyn Sunday School Union.

7. General Section.

Lists of books for a good scholars' library can be obtained from the three schools mentioned earlier in this lesson or from the Church Library Association, Cambridge, Mass.

Ten Converted in a Prison

An inmate of Auburn Prison, New York, writes: "The Christian Herald has afforded me an education. It has greatly helped in staving off grief, because of my incarceration. Its kindly words of good cheer clearly show that salvation can be had when the mind is turned in the right direction. I have ten young friends who read your paper, and they have started to serve God by so doing. It is like getting a message from heaven to get your paper."

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

A SUGGESTION comes from Mrs. F. L. Raynorth, of Bayfield, N. B., that a special verse of Scripture be designated each month for the members of the Prayer League to have particularly in mind, especially at the time of noonday prayer. She suggests for April Isaiah 61: 11: "As the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord God will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before all the nations." This passage is especially appropriate during these days of world strife, when nature is awaking to the new life of spring. May God's blessing on his people soon overflow till all the world shall share his peace. L. T. M. writes from Cumberland, Md.: "Some time ago I wrote, requesting prayers that I might be healed, and for a brighter evidence that I was born of the Spirit. I now wish to return thanks to God that my health is much improved and my faith is stronger and that I have more peace." A Missouri Mother writes to acknowledge answer to prayer for the return of a son after an absence of four years. Mrs. C. W. W. writes: "Some time ago I asked an interest in the Prayer League in behalf of my daughter. God so graciously answered the prayer my faith has been strengthened many fold. I feel as though I could launch out on the sea of faith and ask and trust God for anything."

Mrs. L. E. V. M. writes from Pasadena, Calif., to thank God for wondrously saving three sons and one daughter. H. M. writes from Iowa, acknowledging answer to prayer for assurance of sins forgiven.

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

G. H., Gurley, Ala.; Mrs. E. McD., Maryville, Mo.; Mrs. W. H. C., Arkadelphia, Ark.; R. M., Natural Bridge, Va.; Mrs. R. K. C., Dayton, Ohio; A Michigan Wife and Mother; V. S., Long Beach, Calif.; W. S. D., Pennsylvania; "An Old Subscriber," Bridgeport, Conn.; C. S., Berlin, Mass.; Mrs. F. M. S., Denver, Col.

A Colorado Mother writes: "This is the third time I have asked your prayers for my sons that they may be saved from the drink curse. Oh, the dreadful drink habit! What untold suffering it does bring on the helpless and innocent! Dear little children have to suffer want because the father cares more for drink. Now, dear Prayer League, help me to cling to the all-sufficient Saviour for saving mercy, for he is abundantly able to supply our every need." Mrs. D. McD., Portland, Ore., asks continued prayer that her daughter's hearing may be restored. Rev. J. W. K., of Ohio, asks special prayer that his son's health may be restored, for the baptism of the Holy Spirit upon his church, his son and himself, and for help and guidance in some other matters.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at Pleasant Valley, Wash.; Broomwood, Ga.; Goldsboro, N. C. (a revival that will wake the people up for Christ); Moriches, N. Y. (a revival right from Glory, that many souls may be saved, also for blessing upon a cottage meeting there); Nashville, Tenn. (outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon pastor and church); Inglewood, N. C.; Pleasant Lake, Ind. (at the Baptist Church); Rock Hill, N. Y.; Paris, Ill. (that a church may experience a religious awakening and have its problems satisfactorily settled); Mackford, Wis.; Plain, Texas.

Rev. J. A. W. asks prayer for a genuine Pentecostal revival in all three of his churches in the community of McComb, Miss., and that many may be saved. A request comes from Ontario for prayer for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the people and pastor of a Presbyterian church in a town which is not named, also upon a Sunday school class and its teacher. Prayers are asked that all the converts of a recent revival at Essex, Vt., be firmly established in the faith and be true to Christ, also that many others in the community may be saved and a pastor blessed in his work of soul winning. A. McF. asks prayer for the success of a Sunday school at Belfast, Ark., and that the people be led to a higher plane of Christian life. Prayers are asked for victory of no-license campaigns at Markesan, Fair Water and Brandon, Wis., and that the saloons may be kept out of the town of Marysville, Ohio. H. asks prayers for guidance in Sunday school work. Prayers are asked that a superintendent be found for the Central Union Mission at Washington, D. C., and that the interest of the people in the District of Columbia in the work of this mission may be revived and that friends may be found to pay its debts; that a Spirit-filled minister be sent to Rock Hill, N. Y.; that a church at Lineville, Iowa, may not be forced to discontinue its work; that the minister of the Church of the Brethren near Bangor, Mich., may be blessed in building up the Lord's work there.

F. B. asks prayer that her husband's mind may be restored; W. S. T., that son's mind may be restored; Mrs. E. H. S., her daughter's; L. E. and Mrs. M., their brother's; Mrs. A. E. J. and L. B. B., their sisters'; ten friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for other relatives or friends or for themselves.

Mrs. J. S. and A Subscriber ask prayer that their sight may be restored; S. B. and A. A. M., that their mothers' sight may be restored; R. J. K., sister's. Fourteen friends ask prayer for restoration or strengthening of sight for other relatives or friends or for themselves.

E. L., L. K., A. M. G., J. C. W. and Mrs. M. L. R. ask prayers that their sons may be saved from the drink habit; S. S. W., two sons; Mrs. F. M. S., her sons; Mrs. B., Mrs. F. C. D., Mrs. J. C. M., their husbands; Miss M. C., two brothers; Mrs. F. B. and Mrs. H. C., their brothers. Eight friends ask prayer that other relatives or friends may be saved from the drink habit.

A friend asks prayer that her sister may be cured of the morphine habit.

Fifty-four friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing, including one that she may have strength and courage to confess all her faults and return to God's ark.

Twenty-six parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons.

Fourteen wives ask prayer for the conversion of their husbands.

Forty-six friends ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives and friends, including one who asks prayer that her grandfather may be saved.

Eighteen readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends, including one who asks prayer that her mother's faith may be strengthened and another that her mother may have the assurance of salvation.

Four husbands ask prayer for the healing of their wives; eight wives for the healing of their husbands; seventeen parents for the healing of daughters, including one mother that daughter may be restored to health and strength and spared to her little ones; eight for the healing of sons; forty-six for the healing of other relatives or friends, including one that pastor may be restored to health, and another that a baby seven weeks old may gain strength; sixty-five for the healing of themselves, including one that voice may be restored, that it may be used for the Master; another, that use of limbs may be restored; another, that heart may be strengthened; and another that health may be restored and use of limbs regained.

Fourteen friends ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or others.

Thirty-five friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs, including one who requests prayer for a mother, that a way may be opened to educate her children and they may choose Christian work.

Sixty-one friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including one that a girl may be delivered from a great trouble and return home; another, that she may receive tidings of an estranged and lost daughter; another for a way out of an overwhelming difficulty; another, for a dear relative who is to be tried in June on a serious charge—that the matter may be cleared up and a witness for the accused found; another, that a sorrow may be removed and that home may be restored; another, that a young mother may receive justice at her trial—that husband may be brought to understand his duty to his wife and child; another, that a father may hear from a lost daughter.

Catholicism's Political Growth

ABOUT three years ago, at the time when Farley of New York and O'Connell of Boston were created cardinals of the Roman Catholic Church—"princes of the church," so to speak—I took issue with you in an editorial regarding them. In a very courteous reply you did not in the main agree with my views, especially those I held in regard to their domination of the political affairs of the country.

Three years have wrought wondrous changes. We have seen one of those "princes" claiming precedence over the governor of the State of Massachusetts, and said governor staying away from a banquet on account of it. We have no such thing as a free press today, for the few papers that dare to print the truth are being persecuted and hounded, and in some cases the editors jailed. Free speech is also being fought against, even to bloodshed, and the majority of our Protestant churches are almost ready to apologize to Rome for being allowed to live.

About three hundred of the Protestant ministers of Greater Boston recently made a journey to Philadelphia to implore and entreat Billy Sunday to come to Boston. They were unanimous in their appeal, but there was nothing said about Christ; it was all Billy Sunday. I have never heard of them all joining hands and hearts so unanimously to implore God to save Boston! Have they not, by their action, acknowledged that they are unable to do the work? Isn't it a deplorable thing that the churches get so affected by dry rot that they have to resort to Billy Sunday to revive them? Understand, please, that I am not trying to discredit Billy Sunday, for I think he is a great man and is doing a great work; but the point I raise is that while, through lack of spiritual life, our Protestant churches are so cold and our ministers are so spineless, Romish priests sit back and smile at them.

I am proud of the Christian Herald since it has come out openly against political Romanism, and I have heard others express the same view.

You know the ancient fame of CYPRESS
but do you know its uses today and their significance to you?

CYPRESS is the wood of Scriptural history and of romance; CYPRESS was the mystic wood of mythology—and it was the reliance of the sturdy builders of early America; CYPRESS always has been a magnet for those who have wrought sentiment and beauty into useful things—and CYPRESS is today the staple wood of the hard-headed calculating buyer who seeks the most lasting values for his lumber money.

This concerns YOU—if you like to avoid repair bills on anything made of wood. It was of CYPRESS, according to Pliny, that the famous statue of Jupiter was carved; it existed more than six centuries without a sign of decay.

The historic Gates of Constantinople were of CYPRESS; they were on duty for eleven centuries without a furlough.

The CYPRESS doors of ancient St. Peter's, in Rome, were in a state of perfect preservation when removed by Eugenius IV; they had been swinging on the faithful for twelve centuries.

The only Egyptian mummies that survive intact and unblemished are those whose executors fled them in CYPRESS receptacles.

To bring the record nearer home—there was Thomas Lyon, who in 1640 built him a house in Greenwich, Connecticut. He put CYPRESS shingles on its roof and sides. With no exterior repairs of consequence, this house is today occupied as a residence.

THIS WAS AMERICAN CYPRESS—the kind we own and cut and are selling you.

CYPRESS is in truth "the wood eternal". He who uses Cypress builds but once. If you are putting up a palace or a pasture fence, and want to build it "for keeps"—USE CYPRESS. There is a liberal education (and a wonderful investment value for you) in the CYPRESS advertising—and in the detailed information and reliable counsel to be had promptly, WITHOUT COST, if you will WRITE US YOUR OWN NEEDS (big or little), and ASK YOUR OWN QUESTIONS of the "All-round Helps Department" of the attic window was found to be leaking, and an unpleasant letter came in the mail. Pollyanna, true to her creed, laughingly declared that, for her part, she was glad they had a roof—to leak; and that, as for the letter, she'd been expecting it for a week, anyway, and she was actually glad she wouldn't have to worry any more for fear it would come. It couldn't come now, because it had come; and 'twas over with.

All this, together with sundry other hindrances and annoyances, delayed the usual morning work until far into the afternoon—something that was always particularly displeasing to methodical Aunt Polly, who ordered her own life, preferably, by the tick of the clock.

"But it's half-past three, Pollyanna, already! Did you not know it?" she fretted at last. "And you haven't made the beds yet."

"No, dearie, but I will. Don't worry."

"But did you hear what I said? Look at the clock, child. It's after three o'clock!"

"So 'tis, but never mind, Aunt Polly. We can be glad 'tisn't after four."

Aunt Polly sniffed her disdain. "I suppose you can," she observed tartly.

Pollyanna laughed. "Well, you see, auntie, clocks are accommodating things, when you stop to think about it. I found that out long ago at the Sanatorium. When I was doing something that I liked, and I didn't want the time to go fast, I'd just look at the hour hand, and I'd feel as if I had lots of time—it went so slow. Then, other days, when I had to keep something that hurt on for an hour, maybe, I'd watch the little hand; and you see then I felt as if Old Time was just humping himself to help me out by going as fast as he could. Now I'm watching the hand to-day, 'cause I don't want to go fast. See?" she twinkled chieviously, as she hurried from room, before Aunt Polly had time to answer.

It was certainly a hard day, a night Pollyanna looked pale and out. This, too, was a source of vent to Aunt Polly.

"Dear me, child, you look tired!" she fumed. "What we're ing to do I don't know. I suppose you'll be sick next!"

"Nonsense, auntie! I'm not a bit," declared Pollyanna, dro herself with a sigh onto the couch. "But I am tired. My! how good couch feels! I'm glad I'm tired, all—it's so nice to rest."

Aunt Polly turned with an im- gesture.

"Glad—glad—glad! Yes, of course you're glad, Pollyanna. You're a glad for everything. I never saw such a girl. Oh, yes, I know it's the game, she went on, in answer to the look came to Pollyanna's face. "Ar a very good game, too; but I thir carry it altogether too far. eternal doctrine of 'it might be has got on my nerves, Pollyanna estly, it would be a real relief wouldn't be glad for something, me."

"Why, auntie!" Pollyanna herself half erect.

"Well, it would. You just some time, and see."

"But, auntie, I—" Pollyanna stopped and eyed her aunt reflectly. An odd look came to her eyes; a smile curved her lips. Mrs. C. ton, who had turned back to her work, paid no heed; and, after a minute, Pollyanna lay back on the couch, finishing her sentence, the old smile still on her lips.

as she has always stood, a member of the Triple Alliance, never having denounced the treaty which made her such. The Italian Parliament has been adjourned till May 12.

For many days now Champagne, on the western battle line, has been the scene of one of the greatest and most continuous battles of the war. In practically every bulletin from either the French or Germans during seven or eight weeks, the names of the towns of Souain or Perthes, Le Mesnil and Beausejour have figured.

The fighting has taken place in a parallelogram, with seven miles as the longest side and something like five miles as the shortest.

In this area, Mr. Corey, an American correspondent of standing, who has personally gone over the ground very recently, told us the other day that since February 4 50,000 French had been killed. The Germans a while before had officially admitted in a bulletin that here also their sacrifices had been great.

The Belgians made a small gain on the extreme western end of the right bank of the Yser. Otherwise the week's news has contained only reports of unimportant and unconnected skirmishes and artillery duels. Both sides seem to have been exhausted by the violent efforts at Neuve Chapelle and in the recently finished battle in Champagne.

The Dardanelles were the scene late in the week before of one of the most exciting and important episodes of the war, although news of the event did not reach us until March 20.

The allied fleets made a dashing attempt on Thursday, March 18, to break through the straits. The battle began early in the morning and was opened by the Queen Elizabeth, Inflexible, Agamemnon and Lord Nelson bombarding the forts at the narrows. About noon a French squadron, the Suffren, Gaulois, Charlemagne and Bouvet, also entered the strait and engaged the forts at close range. The fighting became desperate, the ships being frequently hit. A reserve squadron, consisting of the Vengeur, Irresistible, Albion, Ocean, Swsure and Majestic, reinforced the two squadrons already in the strait about 2 P.M., when the fighting increased in violence. Towards half-past three the crew of 700 going down with her. A few minutes after four o'clock the Irresistible left the line of battle, heavily. She had been hit several times and an hour later sank on the shore. A few minutes after the Ocean was either torpedoed or struck a mine, and sank twenty minutes later. Most of the crews of the last two ships were saved. The Inflexible, the Great Britain's new battle cruiser, about five o'clock was hit by fourteen-inch shell, which rendered her unmanageable, killed four officers and forty-three of her crew, and forced her to leave the battle line while the Gaulois of the French squadron was badly damaged by the allied forces.

Some minor craft, destroyed by sweepers, etc., also suffered. About the bombardment ceased allied squadrons withdrew. The loss in lives is somewhere around 5,000. Great Britain and France both despatched other warships to the place of those injured, and he announced their determination the straits at all costs. What was done to the forts by the bombardment cannot be said with accuracy, the Allies claiming the badly damaged and that the troops suffered heavily. They say their loss in lives amounted to twenty-one and that the damage to the forts is easily repaired. Since the action nothing decisive has occurred.

You will have only yourself to blame if you are "talked into" buying an "unsuitable" or a "theoretical" car

The two commonest mistakes made in buying an automobile are—First, Buying a car not suited to your needs.—Second, Buying a car that has not passed the theory stage.

The first mistake—buying an "unsuitable" car—is perhaps made even less often than the second.

The second mistake—buying a "theoretical" car—is perhaps the sadder mistake of the two—because when you have made this mistake, you have on your hands some engineer's or designer's untried theory, instead of a tried, known, successful car. Study your needs sensibly, just as you study your household needs, and buy a car you can afford to enjoy.

*Our sails are dipped in molten sun as round the buoy we fly,
And life seems fresh, with thrill and fun, between the sea and sky.*

The Studebaker Motor

is the long-stroke, high-speed type—powerful and silent in operation—simple in design and extremely accessible in every one of its details. Remarkably economical of fuel owing to improved design of gas passages, valve openings and manifold.

The Studebaker Springs

together with the remarkable balance of the chassis have made this FOUR one of the EASIEST-riding cars on the road. Long, flat, wide, TRIPLE-life springs of Studebaker steel—semi-elliptic in front, full-elliptic underslung in rear. Spring-up end-play—lipped construction and nickel-plated grease-cups in joints.

The Studebaker FULL-floating Rear Axle is not merely a "floating" type of axle—but a real FULL-floating rear axle in which the axle housing carries the weight of the car. TWO Timken Bearings in each hub take up the side-thrusts and the shaft itself is left free merely to turn the wheels. It is the SAFEST and most accessible type of rear axle. Studebaker designed and Studebaker built.

What $985 will buy —because it's a Studebaker

At the first glimpse you get of this Studebaker FOUR you'll begin to appreciate the evident QUALITY that Studebaker has built into its every detail, simply "—because it's a Studebaker."

For you'll find it one of the handsomest cars you ever saw. A car of distinctive design—refined and graceful in line with a rare elegance of finish that few cars at any price can match.

And you'll notice, too, the roominess of this attractive car—and the handsome CROWN fenders and the wide doors with hidden hinges and catches, and deep, restful cushions finished with high-grade, hand-buffed leather. And a hundred other little details that lend beauty and grace to its looks.

But it is only when you study the mechanical construction of the car itself that you realize how much you can buy in this car at $985—how needless it is to pay more for a FOUR—and how unwise, too, it may be to pay less and sacrifice quality—QUALITY you must have, and this is the ONE car that can fully satisfy you on every quality point at a price below one thousand dollars.

The rear axle, for example—it's not merely a "floating" type. This FOUR has a FULL-floating rear axle. It's the most expensive form of axle—but it's the safest and the easiest to get at.

You'll find that instead of following the less expensive construction of driving thro' springs, Studebaker uses TWO radius rods and a torque arm for the drive. The springs are free to take up the jolts and jars—and nothing else.

You'll find brakes of ample size to insure safety at all times on any roads. And a brake-equalizer of the highest type.

You'll find a silent and flexible motor that gives road-mastering power and yet is marvelously economical.

You'll find Timken bearings at every point of HARDEST wear—13 of them in all. Is there any other car at less than a thousand dollars that can give you as many?

You'll find a Studebaker-developed Electric System that never fails. And so in every detail you'll find the QUALITY that Studebaker must put into the Studebaker FOUR "—because it's a Studebaker."

But see this car—stand it side by side with other FOURS—no matter what the price. And judge its quality and what it gives, and then, when you know that you can get all this at $985—backed by the $45,000,000 guarantee of that name of Studebaker—you'll begin to realize that Studebaker QUALITY is not merely an empty phrase.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

THE PINEYS OF NEW JERSEY

STRANGE, SHY, NEGLECTED PEOPLE WHO ARE IN NEED OF THE GOSPEL AND A SOCIAL UPLIFT. PLANS FOR THEIR BETTERMENT

By REV. A. W. BOSTWICK, Rector, Trinity Church, Vincentown, N. J.

THE piney region of New Jersey presents a wonderful opportunity for Christian service. Beginning only twenty-seven and a half miles outside of the city of Philadelphia, with almost any of the small villages of that region you enter what is known as the pine belt of New Jersey, running through three counties, Burlington, Ocean and Atlantic, never leaving it until you reach the shore. Wonderfully attractive in the early summer, with its great stretches of laurel, mile after mile along your path; or as you raise your eye over the bog you see the beautiful white egret or, in late autumn, among the cranberry bogs you see the hundreds of Italians clothed in their varied colors. In the course of your day's journey, you come suddenly, like in the woods, upon a little hut—with one little room, or two or three, it may be—and a little boy, attracted by you because he sees you are a stranger, comes out, and lifts his little face up toward you and just says, "Huh."

You take a good look at him. There is something queer about the boy—his strange gait as he came toward you, his sloping shoulders, his pasty complexion, the dead look in his eye. You want to say, "But what in the world's the matter with you? What have you done to yourself, anyway?" He is only a little piney boy. We have about four thousand of them in this region, and they present to us three problems—one of the mental deficient, one of the moral deficient, and the third, the problem of life itself. It seems strange, in these days, in a Christian state like New Jersey, when you consider what New Jersey is supposed to be, that you will stumble so often, in that region, upon great grown-up men or women, thirty or forty years of age—the age doesn't make any difference—yet with the mind of a little child of eight, ten or twelve. Wherever the mind has been affected, I don't think I have ever seen them above twelve years old mentally. It won't make any difference how old they grow in body mentally they will always be the same, like little children.

I saw a boy on the steps of the house the other day, and he had a pile of money laid out on the steps. "Hennie," I said, "what in the world are you doing?"

"I'm tryin' to count me money," said the little fellow.

I noticed he had his money laid out in piles of fives, sometimes a five-cent piece, sometimes five pennies.

"He," said he, "I have a dollar and thirty cents there, and I can't count out how much this is." And he held out his little hand toward me, and I noticed he had three pennies in it. Somebody in the woods had caught little Johnnie to count on his fingers, and when he was short two cents he couldn't figure out for himself just how much he had, so for every dollar and thirty-three cents he had, he had to short-change himself, and call it a dollar-thirty.

I remember when Governor Fielder came down last spring because he wanted to see these people with his own eyes and to hear their story with his own ears, one of the places I took him to was half a great, grown-up fellow, named "Joe Boy," and said, "Now, Joe Boy, the governor has come down here today to see you, that he may find out something about you, himself. And I want you to tell the governor what education you have and something about your opportunities in life."

"Well, now," said Joe Boy, "you know, Mr. Bostwick, I ain't had much education in life. I've just been kicked around from one place to another, and ain't never had a chance."

"I know," said I, "but tell him something about yourself. What day of the week is it?" I asked.

"Well"—he didn't just know the day of the week.

"What month of the year is it?" said I.

"Well"—he didn't just know that.

"Well, now, I tell you, Joe Boy, you name over the months of the year for the governor."

"What," said he, "you mean, name 'em all?"

"Yes, name them all."

"Well, now, I can't do that," said Joe Boy, "but I can give you one of 'em. I remember the Fourth of July." And that was the best he could do.

The truth is that Joe Boy is one of the fellows whom it is impossible to keep straight. He is always tumbling into trouble. I no sooner get him out of one strait than he is in another—either marrying another girl, or stealing something that doesn't belong to him. He doesn't seem to have the mental balance that is essential to keep in the right way.

There has been opened, at a place called Four-Mile, a colony for the extreme cases of mental defectives. This is the first rural colony of its kind in the state of New Jersey. The buildings for this some occupation in life that will enable them to support themselves to some degree when they come to the age of responsibility.

After all, the great danger in this community comes not from the mental deficient, but from the moral deficient. It seems strange, again, that in a Christian state like New Jersey, in these days, you will stumble here so often in the woods upon men or women with anywhere from two to five wives or husbands. Living by themselves generation after generation for a century, secluded and left to go on in accordance with their own traditions and customs, it is not to be wondered at that some of these customs to which the Pineys have held tenaciously have wrought great havoc, both to the Pineys themselves and to the surrounding neighborhoods.

There is poor Louisa, a mere slip of a girl, the "Gipsy of the Pines," as she is called because of her dashing black eye and her black hair, and the bit of color with which she loves to adorn herself. She is not much more than a stone's throw from the rectory. She has five husbands! I remember last spring, one of them, Lonnie, a notorious character of the region, came down into the village where I live, paid a dollar for his license, the same as any one else would, swearing, without much compunction, that Louisa had never been married before, and obtained a license for her to marry Jim, a friend of his. Lonnie, Louisa's husband, had sold her to Jim for $32. In the same house where Lonnie lives—the famous home known as the "Pig and Whistle"—lived "Joe Boy," whom I have spoken of before. "Joe Boy" already had two wives, but he also had a fondness for Ida; so "Joe Boy" paid $1 also and he, too, got a license at the same time Lonnie got his. I remember, on my return home that afternoon, hearing about the prospective wedding, and going out to the place where the weddings were to be held. Jim, the prospective husband, came out to my buggy. I told him I had heard there were to be some weddings out there that night.

"Yes," said he, "we're going to be married."

"How many times have you been married?" said I.

"Only twice," said Jim.

The end of it was that, after some conversation, I handed Jim back his $2 and brought home the licenses with me. I still have them in my possession, as pieces of curious literature; but these experiences are not uncommon among the Pineys. The truth is that many of them are so tangled up in institution have already been erected at a cost of some $10,000, and the institution is about filled now to its capacity. We have in the community, according to statistics, one child in every four in this condition of mental deficiency; not in the extreme condition of the people who are put at Four-Mile, but yet whose minds are in such a state that in all probability they will never develop beyond the age of an ordinary child of twelve years. Four rural schools have been opened for the mental deficient whose minds will develop up to the age of twelve years. These children will be taught by specially trained teachers and fitted, it is hoped, for their wedding ventures, that it is almost impossible to unravel them, and tell who is who.

We have, within a narrow radius, fifty-two illegitimate children. I remember, not long ago, on the main street of our village, one woman in whose home there were four illegitimate children, and her last little baby she just took and put in a bureau drawer, and shut the drawer upon it. She is serving her term in prison for that now.

There are numerous examples in families where there are four generations of illegitimates, and a condition invariably accompanies that fact—four generations of people who can neither read nor write!

I have been ten years rector of the parish where I serve, studying the origin, the continued life, the outcome of the problems of these people, and I am writing merely the story of my daily ministry among a good people whom I have tried to serve.

You will hear a great many tales of the Pineys, and so I have confined myself strictly to facts, which have come in my own ministerial experience among a people whose heartaches and sorrows and difficulties of life I have tried to find some solution for.

How do these people support themselves? Man only needs two things in this world, God and bread. And when I think of the struggle of the Pineys for bread, for the mere necessity for daily life, for just enough to keep the body clothed and fed, I realize what a struggle there is. They pick cranberries, some; work on the bogs, some; switch the huckleberries; make umbrella handles or ax-handles; cut cord-wood; or in the middle of the winter, you will see the little boys who have broken through the ice up to their knees in the water, gathering fresh moss for the florists in the city. But their financial reward is very meager and intermittent. I sometimes like to ask Christian people what they would do with some of the problems which we find daily confronting us. It isn't as if we were in a big city, where there were a hundred agencies to which one might turn for help. We have to depend largely upon our wits to solve many of the problems as they come to us.

What would you do in the case of poor Sarah, for instance? She lives in a little stretch of woods, not so far from the rectory, with her twin babies. And her sister with her baby. And her still older sister with her baby. And no father for any of them! And Sarah, the babies, and the home with all its unspeakable dirt and filth. I remember the first time I went into that home, there was nothing there, except an old couch and a stove. I couldn't find even anything to cook with.

How shall she get work? She has too far to go to it, and how shall the babies be taken care of, if she go? People can't take her work. What would you do with a problem of that sort, to bring her into some sense of what human fellowship and decency of life mean? Or, farther up the road, in a little similar one-room hut, there is poor Warry's widow. Warry was killed by lightning last summer. I remember going up there and saying to the poor woman, "Mrs. Brown, how are you going to get along, now that Warry is dead?"

"Why," said she, "Warry left me his entire 'state.'"

That sounded pretty good to me. "What do you mean by that—his entire estate?" I asked.

"Why, he left me these eight acres of land," she said, "and this house."

Eight acres of land! You couldn't possibly grow anything on those acres. I remember the pine stumps were even still in the front, so that I almost tipped my buggy over trying to get in the place.

"Why, Warry paid $100 for this," said she; "that is, he paid $5 cash and I've got the rest to pay."

That was Warry's "entire estate"—five dollars in cash. And you can't let little babies starve, can you? So we have had to look out for them, and feed them, and clothe them, since Warry died, as we have had to do with a good many Piney children.

Or, again, to understand something of the ignorance of the Pineys, look at Benny's children. Only a little farther up the road there are fifteen of them, eleven of them of school age, and they have to walk six miles to school every day. Suppose, on Saturday night, father had to buy eleven pair of shoes in place of two or three, and didn't have money enough to buy even one pair. Or suppose you had to put up eleven lunches every day for them to take along to school, and you didn't have anything to put up for them. Why, I remember that, at the school where Benny's boys go, last winter some of the little children in that school would say to their mother: "Mother, put in an extra piece of bread for one of Benny's boys," that he might not go hungry.

And then, further, when the winter snows come, harder than they have this winter, and the roads are all closed up, how shall Benny's boys get to interested in the betterment and saving of the American stock, for the Piney is not the scum of the earth. He is a real American, going back history to the time of the refugees of the Revolutionary period. And he is today what Governor Fielder terms "an example of what the la religion and education can do to a people of ancestry."

One can imagine the plea of a little Piney set right in the midst of our Christian civilization saying: "You never came to me to minister and look at me, what I have become."

What is it we are trying to do? I remember a little girl in the woods coming to me, and putting her little hand in mine, saying, "Mr. Bostwick, you find my mother for me?" Then she told me a little story. I remember hunting through the thicket until I found her mother. I went up to her and touching her on the shoulder, said, "Your mother Mary sent me to you to tell you that she loves you and to ask you if you won't come back home to her."

Every child cries for mother, and we are trying to bring home to them a sense of the reality of motherhood means. I remember my own little boy when he was a baby, crying out from the nursery because he had hurt his finger, and the nurse running to him. I could hear his little voice saying, "Go 'way. I want mother." And every child cries for mother. There is no one who will take the place of mother in the life of the child.

We have put a trained nurse in the region, who, by her influence and her teaching, will bring home to them a reality of the sense of what motherhood is. It is better in life to be pure than impure; it is better to be clean than to be dirty. Wherever there is need, a call within twenty-four miles, the nurse responds. This summer we shall start to build a home for our workers, and a small hospital will be attached to that home, where the nurse may bring the people to their homes down to her, that they may be better cared for, and, we hope, inspired somewhat to better things, under her influence. We are planning to do something with the economic side, helping the people in their daily struggle for bread.

We estimate that it will take $10,000 for that building, including in connection with the workers home and the hospital wing about $15,000 for the three buildings. The Piney is wonderfully imitative, and in our larger building we hope to have the equipment necessary to teach him some of the essential things of the daily living. He is what he is not because he wants to be so, but because he has been given a sufficient opportunity. In that building, the man or woman who can't read or write will be taught; girls will be instructed in cooking and to keep house. We shall also have a small industry in rug-making, by which the people will be helped to support themselves. In the autumn, we shall have another worker added to the staff, who will teach the Pineys along industrial lines. This place will also serve as a social center in the community. We hope to establish two of these centers as remedial influences of betterment, one at Mercer town, the other over toward Browns Mills. From which we may reach out to the scattered people in the communities. We shall welcome the interest of any one who feels drawn to the work, and any inquiries sent to the Christian Herald will receive attention.

THE AUTHOR AND GOVERNOR FIELDER TALK WITH HUCKLEBERRY PICKERS

school then? When you begin to look into the conditions and know the lives and the hardships and the struggles of the Pineys, you begin to understand something of why the Piney is what he is today.

Governor Fielder, the present executive of New Jersey, has taken more than a passing interest in the problem of the Piney. He has evidenced in many ways his willingness and determination to render any aid within his power to right conditions which, as they exist, are the greatest moral menace that the state of New Jersey has within its borders today. The state authorities, in fact, have been more quick of co-operation than the local communities. They are willing to help with good roads, with better schools, and to put every part of the state government at the service of any who may be

EVANGELIST SUNDAY'S MISSION AND METHOD

A CLOSE-RANGE VIEW OF HIS WORK AND THE WONDERFUL ORGANIZATION BEHIND IT

BY WILLIAM B. ASHLEY

THE one outstanding characterization of Evangelist William A. Sunday is that he gets results. This is the final word of praise from his enthusiastic admirers; it is the answer that suffices to silence criticism; it is the argument that persuades the hesitant minister: he gets results. It is the most effective claim which can be made for a man on any account in the present day, and there is scarcely a church, a pastor or an active layman who will not be interested in an inquiry as to how this noted evangelist gets results and what the results are.

On the last day of his eleven weeks' campaign in Philadelphia, Mr. Sunday declared, in effect, that the success of that great religious undertaking was due to organization, prayer having the chief place. He stoutly disclaimed all personal credit for the results, and all personal responsibility for whatever might happen in Philadelphia after his departure.

Coming from the evangelist himself, who ought to know, this is important. If Mr. Sunday had not so frankly and publicly expressed his appreciation of the part that organization of Christian effort has in his revival campaigns, a discussion of that point might seem superfluous. Yet it is evident at the outset that one of the most remarkable results attained is this same organization of Christian forces in every community where he labors.

It is proper to state that the writer, from personal observation, is impressed with the belief that the Rev. Mr. Sunday is trying, with all his concentrated might, to bring into the field of Christian evangelism factors which make for success in far different fields of human endeavor. The Sunday tabernacle campaigns are designed to show the church today how to win souls by new and unusual methods, and it behooves the church to consider those methods

A YEAR ago, all was lovely in the City of Brotherly Love. That is to say, business was good, politics "rotten," as politics should be in order to keep good men attending to civic affairs; the churches were filled, the factories were humming, the workers were doing their best to accommodate the crowded saloons worked overtime, the street cars kept their schedule, historic spots were thronged, libraries were crowded, art was patronized, the newspapers eked out somehow upon the war news, the churches were open on Sundays and once in the middle of the week whether there seemed to be a demand for religious activity or not, all as usual, and nobody thinking of making a change. In short, Philadelphia was contented and contented.

Though I might add that the Lord's religion

Philadelphia continued on their knees night and day beseeching him to show himself strong in behalf of his church in Philadelphia. There are not a few good people who very naturally connect this latter circumstance with the coming of Mr. Sunday to Philadelphia. Yes, in Philadelphia there had been for long time a persistent and increasing wish on the part of many Christian people that their city should experience a great revival. This prayerful wish is in the hearts of devout Christians of every community today. It is the initial moon toward a revival. People who feel that way talk that way, and confer together on ways and means to bring about an answer to their prayers. It was so in Philadelphia. And some one proposed that the churches invite Billy Sunday.

Billy Sunday at that time was in the midst of a campaign elsewhere. From the beginning of his career, his eccentricities of speech and his platform action had been discussed in local papers and have served to keep him well before the public. His meetings were well reported, and the reports somehow reached the best mediums for wide publicity. And as he moved from place to place, his growing reputation and extending organization everywhere increased the rests that followed on his ministry. He early adopted the practice employed by most evangelists of having enthusiastic workers of a town where tabernacle meetings have been held go singly or in groups to localities that were considering the holding of such meetings, and thus the fame of his work was spread abroad. These methods are frankly employed, in keeping with Mr. Sunday's purpose to carry into the field of evangelism measures which bring success in other fields. Publicity is one of the important factors in evangelistic work. It is basic. It was the publicity his work had already won that primarily made Mr. Sunday known to those in Philadelphia who initiated the movement to invite him there. There was at first very little information about the evangelist's personal compelling message, his thousands of converts, gained their ideas of Sunday from following the Bu immediately the movement was started to invite him to Philadelphia, organized publicity, as a part of the methods so successfully employed in Mr. Sunday's campaign, was actively introduced. The conferences between the churches, the reports of visiting delegations from towns where Mr. Sunday had appeared, the slogan "he gets results," discussed in full in the local press created a universal desire to send hear this heroic figure among the evangelists of the day, and united the churches in the belief that his coming would inaugurate the greatest revival in Philadelphia's history. By the time the churches were ready to meet his conditions and issued the formal invitation which secured the evangelist's promise to hold the meetings, his enthusiastic reception was assured. Among the results obtained by Mr. Sunday must be noted that of a unanimous invitation on the part of the churches of a city, supported by popular demand, that he come to their assistance.

IT is now that the organizing of the work begins. This organizing is done under the personal direction of Mr. Sunday, through his representatives. The local committee may suggest methods of its own and such suggestions may be adopted, but never when they conflict with Mr. Sunday's settled convictions, formed from long practical experience, as to what will produce the results.

Philadelphia was divided into twenty districts, each with a population of about 80,000. Excepting Pittsburg, Mr. Sunday had never preached in a place as big as one of these districts. Parson has only about 130,000 population. In Philadelphia, each district was organized as a unit, having its own executive committee of four, and sub-committee composed of a representative from each Protestant church in the district. There was also a woman's committee in each district. All of these district committees were responsible to a central city executive committee, composed of men of large affairs, and having its suite of offices in the Stock Exchange building. This latter committee directed all activities, including that of publicity.

All the pastors co-operated with the committees. The churches were made to feel that the Sunday campaign in reality meant a wonderful opportunity for them to rehabilitate themselves. Every possible stimulus was put upon the church membership to arouse to the task. Two hundred thousand church people throughout the city were lined up to do distinctive work in ushering the campaign, and in seeking, by personal interest and invitation, to bring multitudes into the tabernacle. One experiment, however, was permitted by Mr. Sunday which failed. Tickets were issued to every church member who agreed to bring a "trail-hitter" to a tabernacle meeting. The result was a veritable storming of the doors by ticket-holders and their willing "prospects." The committee admitted that conditions made such a plan impracticable. But at every meeting in the tabernacle several hundred seats were reserved, on one side of the building for men, on the other for women, who, upon the assurance that at that meeting they intended to hit the trail, received special admission tickets which alone could get any one in through the indicated doors.

Besides the constant personal work done by church members in general, and the five thousand prayer meetings held throughout the city during the five weeks immediately preceding the campaign, seven hundred selected personal workers were instructed in Mr. Sunday's methods of assisting prospective converts to hit the trail, and in guiding and helping them in every way, as they went forward to grasp the evangelist's hand in evidence of their public acceptance of Jesus Christ as their personal Saviour; and to direct them to first seats vacated by the congregation, that the record of their Christian decision and their church preference might be made upon cards prepared for the purpose.

Fifteen hundred business and professional men of the city were drilled as ushers. Fifty other carefully chosen men acted as secretaries to take down the names of the converts. Nearly two hundred policemen and firemen were on duty at every meeting, but these can scarcely be considered as part of the organization. The great chorus choir numbered 3,600, half that number on duty at a time. At the men's meetings, the male choir numbered two thousand.

THE creation of this tremendous organization—press, pulpit, Sunday school and other church associations and societies, individual church members, sympathetic friends, committees, business firms—all working as a unit in homes, stores, workshops, prayer meetings, church services, and in a hundred ways to prepare a city to receive the message of the evangelist, is a second result which Evangelist Sunday gets. He has succeeded in touching the secret spring that sets in motion all the aggressive Christianity in the church; and has devised the methods by which that aggressive force shall make itself felt in its community.

It is stated by leaders in this preparatory work that not only was intense curiosity awakened among all classes to hear the evangelist, but a predisposition to a Christian life was felt by multitudes, and a renewal of church duties by lukewarm members was noted in every church; and conversions also were many. One of the especial objects of this temporary federation of the churches was to bring as many lukewarm Christians and unconverted people as possible into a state of mind in which they would be susceptible to the appeal of the tabernacle meetings. A telegram to Mr. Sunday from one of his aides in Paterson read: "City is thoroughly aroused; full of expectancy and enthusiasm, and ready to follow your leadership."

It may be mentioned, in passing, that not the least satisfactory result of this preliminary work was the ready subscription of all the funds necessary for the campaign. In Philadelphia, this amounted to about fifty-two thousand dollars, eighteen thousand dollars of which represented the cost of the building itself. The balance was expended for lighting and heating, printing and other incidental matters and included, it is stated, two-thirds of the cost to Mr. Sunday of the maintenance of his own party, composed of sixteen persons besides himself. The details of these expenditures are not available, but the point is that whatever the Sunday campaigns cost is willingly paid in advance by those who wish to hear him. Perhaps this excellent financial condition might be mentioned as one distinctive result that Mr. Sunday gets.

MR. SUNDAY reached Philadelphia at the height of the public interest in his personality. In the history of evangelism, there had never been a parallel to the conditions which surrounded the Philadelphia meetings. During the eleven weeks of his stay, 146 services were held in the tabernacle, attended approximately by two and one-half million people. Mr. Sunday preached at every one of these services. Approximately 45,000 "trail-hitters" were counted. It is thought that as many more "signed up" as converts in the five hundred outside meetings conducted by members of the Sunday party in private homes, business houses, and other places, and by pastors in their churches. Contrary to the general understanding, all the churches at Philadelphia were not closed all the time while the meetings were on, but were closed district by district, in order that every one in the respective districts might have opportunity to attend the meetings. In the course of the tabernacle meetings, over fifteen thousand dollars was contributed for special charities and the final offering to Mr. Sunday himself amounted to between fifty-two and fifty-three thousand dollars. This sum was made up by many individual checks, some of large amount, and by the free-will offerings in the tabernacle at the close of the first ten weeks of the campaign. An eleventh week was added to the program, largely in the interest of local option, and at the close of that week a scattering free-will offering was gathered, most of which Mr. Sunday contributed to the poor of Philadelphia, accepting for himself only what he felt he had reason to believe was intended as a part of the original personal thank-offering. Mr. Sunday shares with his organization the actual work inside the tabernacle. It is manifestly impossible to conceive of him without his organization. In the first place, it must be admitted that, without his organization, he would not have such audiences. No man would, today. And while it is impossible to define what percentage of converts is obtained by the spiritual force of the words of his message, it is reasonable to estimate the part his organization fulfils in producing the final results.

The Philadelphia tabernacle held approximately eighteen thousand people. About three thousand of that number at each meeting were part of the organization. Fully fifty per cent. of the remainder, it is safe to say, were at least nominal church members. Of the remaining seven to eight thousand, the majority were people who had always lived within reach of church influences. We may assume that a small minority only of the immense audiences were men and women of evil lives, of aggressively un-Christian habits and beliefs; the kind of people, in a word, for whose uplift evangelistic work presumably is carried on.

These audiences, so constituted, were there with a disposition friendly to the evangelist's message. This has been shown in the preliminary work of the organization. In case of out-and-out unbelievers, their hearts had been, for the most part, already touched in some degree by the work that had gone before—results, let it be remembered, arrived at intentionally by the methods employed.

The crowds at the meetings were moved upon by the magnificent singing of the chorus choir. That effective vocal work was augmented by the wonderful singing of the great hosts, under the leadership of Mr. Homer A. Rodeheaver. Evidence of the general character of the audience was found in their familiarity with the hymns and their fondness for them. The previous thorough training of the choir enabled Mr. Rodeheaver to use that part of the organization as a great human organ, and the appeal of music has never been more effectively employed. To this influence upon the audience must be added the psychological effect produced by the concentration of so many minds upon one object. These meetings were being prayed for by thousands, as they progressed. Friends uncountable were thinking of those who they hoped would yield to the opportunity. The reputation of the evangelist himself inspired every one to expect results. And to such an audience, in such a mood, brought together by the superb organization of religious forces of the city under his personal direction, Billy Sunday delivered his message.

Mr. Sunday's sermons have occasionally been referred to as stereotyped. Under what conditions of inspiration they may have been prepared, it is not important now to inquire. They are the climax of his efforts, under conditions he has created to get results. And they do. The Sunday message comes from his lips with all the earnestness and vigor and expression of impromptu address. He could not put more energy and personality and spontaneity into a message delivered to him by inspiration while he speaks. Even were the actions that accompany his words called in question—as they sometimes have been—as studied and automatic, they are a part of his system, and their effectiveness is undeniable. This is his chosen course of preaching the Gospel. It is his finishing touch that he puts upon the evangelistic campaign which he has devised.

THE TOWERS AND BULWARKS OF ZION

A REVIVAL SERMON BY REV. FRENCH E. OLIVER, D.D.*

"Walk about Zion, and go round about her; tell the towers thereof; for this God is our God for ever and ever." Ps. 48: 12, 14

THE word "Zion" in the original Hebrew is made up of two words: "Tsee Yone," meaning sunny. Zion is the most south-westerly hill upon which the city of Jerusalem stands. It was the great fortress of the Jebusites; there the "Castle of Zion" stood, and when David captured the fortress he dwelt in the castle. The word "Zion" in the Bible is used symbolically of heaven, Jerusalem and the church. It is my purpose to use the term in its spiritual symbolism of the church.

Our text advocates no superficial pleasure excursion. The language is as clear as a bugle call: "Walk about Zion, and go round about her." In other words, make an honest investigation of her right to have place on the earth. Such investigation will prove to you who make it that the church is a divine institution, and that she has a holy mission to perform; a God-given sphere to occupy, till Jesus comes to reward her for her labor of love or judge her for her deeds of sinfulness or idleness.

Compare the triumphs of the great men of Zion—heroes of the faith—with the great heathen nations. For a recent illustration, take the great hero of Japan, Count Nogi. No doubt you will recall his frightful act when the emperor or Mikado died. He and his wife entered into a suicide pact, and carried it into execution when the signal was given that the emperor had been carried to his last resting-place. The Japanese idea of loyalty to a ruler is set before you in that frightful act, and that which is the pride of Japan is the colossal disgrace of Japan. Thank God, fidelity to Jesus Christ our King is seen in a life of service which blesses the fallen race and makes the world a better place in which to live.

Looking to the Foundations

THE second important command of the text is this: "Tell the towers thereof." These towers stand forth in grace and majesty in Zion—pointing us the heavenly country where our hopes are to be realized when we awake in the likeness of our Saviour and behold him face to face. The first tower which attracts the eyes of eternity-bound pilgrims is the tower of Divine Revelation. The mystery of the existence of man upon this earth demands an explanation. Whence comes man? Who created him? Why was he created? Where will he spend eternity? Where did he get his faculties? From whom did he get his ideas of right living? It is evident that a design is the product of a designer. The law of cause and effect demands this conclusion.

When Dr. Rainsford was in London he was visited by an old friend, professor in the University of Berlin. The professor was a skeptic, and the eminent preacher delivered a powerful sermon on Christian evidences, with the skepticism of his friend duly considered. As they walked together from the service to the home of the minister, he asked the professor this question: "What do you think of the claims of Christianity?" The man replied: "Christianity is beautiful, but I do not believe a word of it." Dr. Rainsford said: "Professor, do you not believe that possibly there is a God?" He replied: "Most certainly I admit the possible existence of God. I could not do otherwise and be reasonable." Then the minister asked: "Have you ever thought that since God created man he must be kindly disposed toward him?" The professor replied: "If God created man, he certainly would be compelled to be kindly disposed toward him." The minister asked: "Have you considered the fact that if he is kindly disposed toward his creatures he must make a revelation of himself to them?" The professor replied: "I have never admitted to myself that God has made a revelation of himself to the human race; however, it is not impossible that he should do so." When they were at last in the study of the minister, Dr. Rainsford said: "Professor, have you ever asked God to reveal himself to you?" The professor answered negatively. Then he was asked this question: "Are you willing to ask God to reveal himself to you?" The skeptic was an honest doubter. Therefore he said he was willing to ask God to make a revelation of himself to his heart, and added the statement that he would follow such a revelation. At the suggestion of Dr. Rainsford they knelt in prayer. When the minister finished his prayer he asked the professor to pray. He said: "O God—if there be a God; if the Bible is thy Word, and Christ is thy Son, and if a revelation of the truth be possible, make thyself known to me and I will follow the revelation at any cost." Dr. Rainsford said the professor sprang to his feet when he had made that promise and said: "I see it! I see it! Jesus Christ is the Son of God! It is beautiful! It is beautiful!"

Thank God, the tower of Divine Revelation offers a guarantee of personal friendship with the Creator and a knowledge of his Son, our Saviour. Are you honest enough to test him now?

The second tower in Zion which sheds its rays of light upon human needs is Saving Faith. There is a vast difference between the mere intellectual acceptance of the doctrines of the Bible and the spiritual acceptance of them. "The demons believe and tremble," yet their believing and trembling makes no difference in their character. Saving faith regenerates the whole man. Mere mental faith may degenerate him. Saving faith raises the conscience to the standard of the Bible. Mere mental faith may permit the conscience and the morals to decay. Faith is a component part of the soul. The faith faculty marks the differentiation between man and the brute life about him. Man is on a higher plane. He feels the call to eternal peace within his soul. God speaks to his conscience and warns him to flee from the wrath to come. He obeys the call of God and he builds for eternity.

Signs of Strength

GEORGE MULLER went to Birmingham when a young man, and God put upon his heart a burden for the welfare of the orphans. He never asked a living man or woman for money, but when he needed it he called mightily to God and, after caring for thousands of orphans and spending millions of dollars, he was summoned to report to his Creator at the end of a marvelous career. You cannot account for the wonderful life he lived upon any other possible basis than that he, by saving faith, was brought into vital relationship with God. His work was a modern miracle, and the great institution he established still moves forward, supported by faith and in answer to effectual fervent prayer. Thank God there is such a tower as Saving Faith in Zion, which sheds its beams of light upon the whole relationship of man to his Creator and to his fellows in this world.

The third tower in Zion is Righteousness. There is a line of demarcation between the Christian and the sinner, and that line is the righteousness of Christ, which protects his disciples from the wrath to come, and which shines gloriously in their lives while they fight the good fight of faith. We hear people depreciate the caste system of some of the heathen nations, and it is a curse to every nation in which it finds support. If you will read the first psalm you will see a caste system advocated most vehemently; it is the caste system of pure and undefiled religion. God demands more than mere morality from his followers. There must be the sweetness of righteousness in their lives. The world demands more of the Christian than it demands of its own children. When a professing Christian goes wrong the world looks with scorn upon that step because the man has professed to be a new creation in Christ Jesus.

When a gambler was converted in one of our Western meetings, he began personal work, and when he approached an old schoolmate and asked her to become a Christian, she said: "I know the life you have been living; if you mean this, come to me in six months and I shall be glad to talk it over with you. When you live up to your profession for six months, then I will believe you are sincere." She was right about it: "By their fruits ye shall know them." Christ gave us that test of discipleship. The tower of righteousness indicates the need of lifting the bottom of our lives up to the top of our light.

Fortified by Service

THE fourth tower in Zion is Personal Service. Jesus Christ has no use for an idler. He says: "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples." Zion is no refuge for sloths or cowards; it is an aggressive, industrious city. Initiative is supreme; action is universal; the joy of accomplishment floods the hearts of all the true residents of Zion. When General Booth of the Salvation Army desired to say the most in one word to his American Army, he cabled one word above his name. The message read: "Others. BOOTH." He knew if he could fire them with love and service for others he would have the joy of knowing that they had turned thousands to Christ.

It is possible to live a wastrel selfish life, and lament through all eternity the years spent in self-indulgence and sin. There is a woman who lives in Indiana who made New York City a few years ago. She appeared on the streets with diamonds in her shoe-heels. She went back a year later and made them gasp some more by appearing in public places with ropes of diamonds strung to her shoulder-straps and attached to her elbows and to the rings on her fingers. Now it is possible to resolve life into such unreasonable and unwomanly procedure, but, thank God, there is a more excellent way to live.

When George Buzelle of Brooklyn lay down, and the pastors had paid high tribute to his life of service to God and God's poor in Great New York, a young man stood by the coffin and wept like a child. One of the pastors said to this young man: "We have lost a friend today, haven't we?" The young man replied: "He was the best friend I ever had; he led me to Jesus Christ." The four towers in Zion constantly reminds us that God wants us to live for others. I would rather wear the badge of service than a rope of diamonds as long as I can live.

The towers of Zion are guarded and protected by impregnable bulwarks. The first bulwark for our consideration is that mighty fortress called Creation. Upon it we read: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." There is scientific and philosophic security in his hand behind that bulwark. I pity the man who is larger than the rampart behind which he tries to hide. I am sorry for the little professors who are trying to hide behind "a protoplasmic monad" or "spontaneous generation" or any other paper port of atheistic evolution. The people of earth, who are hunting for a satisfactory explanation of creation, can find it in the language of the Bible: "I will understand that the worlds were framed by the Word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear." The reason of denying God in creation is easily covered. All creation pulsates with life, and it is astounding folly to claim that life is produced by a purposeless, lifeless, inanimate nonentity.

Mightiest Love

THE second bulwark which I behold in Zion is God's Law. Law or lust rules every life in the world. You are servant to whom you yield; you are self servant to obey. The man who has an unbroken Ten Commandments is not fit to trust for ten seconds. Law is necessary to every enterprise. There must be order and system in our thinking and living or else disorder, chaos and mental degeneracy will prevail. Had God not preached the Ten Commandments to Moses on Mount Sinai, Jesus would never have preached the Beatitudes on the mount to the assembled multitudes. The man who pretends to love the law on the Mount and hates the commandment which are called the law of God, will not do to trust in Christ came, not to destroy the law, but to fulfill it.

Several years ago a great English preacher was in our country, and at the close of his sermon he came to the platform and asked him to shake hands with her little boy. She said: "I want him to be able to say when he grows up that I shook hands with one of the greatest preachers in England." The little boy came up very shy and extended his left hand, while he held his right behind his back. The preacher asked: "Is there anything wrong with your right hand?" The boy said, "No, sir." The minister said, "Well, my lad, the right hand is the one to use." He brought his hand from behind his back, and his fingers were closed over something. The great preacher was interested to know what the little hand was holding. He said: "What have you got in your hand, my lad?" The boy opened his hand slowly, and there he had three marbles which were dearer to his boyish heart than a haughty smile with a king. You smile at the childish character. Let me ask you, What have you got in your hand just now? There is a Hand sketch

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D.,

Kings and Priests

SUNDAY, April 18. Revelation 1: 6. "He hath made us kings and priests unto God." He makes kings out of slaves; he transforms outcasts into priests. He takes life in which there is no noble sovereignty and control, and he gives the soul a scepter and a throne. He takes a soul which has lived in the streets, in the mere passage and outer things of life, and he leads it into the holy of holies, and gives it a place in the sanctuary of the Innermost, and a ministry at the divine altar of sacrifice. It is the most marvelous change in a world which is full of changes. He gives the imperial purple to the beggar, the miter to him who has gone far astray. Yes, the God of grace takes his kings from servitude and his priests from the mire.

How, then, shall his kings be known? What shall be the sign of their sovereignty? They shall be known by the royalty of their bearing, by the loftiness of their carriage, by their royal way of doing ordinary things, by the manner in which they crow the commonplace with distinction. They perform unattractive duties with grace, thus convert dull opportunities into state occasions. They stamp the kingly superscription upon the meanest coin. They prove their kingliness by an elevation which touches everything into dignity. The life "in the heavenlies in Christ Jesus." They sit with him on his throne.

How shall the priests be known? By their power of intercession, and therefore by their self-forgetfulness and self-sacrifice. They minister at the altar in no selfish quest, but in the service of their brethren. They may therefore be known by the openness of their sympathies, by their wide-open hearts, by their wakeful readiness to take another's need to the mercy seat, and to bring to him the rich bounties of grace. A priest is one who has a well-trodden way to God, and who treads it in the interest of his brother. J. H. J.

Haste in Prayer Means Fever and Failure

MONDAY, April 19. Isaiah 28: 14-22. "He that believeth shall not make haste." One of the greatest mistakes in life is hasty praying. We rush into God's presence, and try in a few hurried sentences to link him to our cause and inflame him without strong emotions. And before we have decidedly ended we are off to do some busy thing, with hardly a thought of the great aid we have invoked. Is it to be wondered at that we are so feverish, fitful, anxious and fretful? The quick-firing guns must have time to cool, but how little space do we devote to the cooling processes of our soul? If we only realized the true nature of prayer we could understand that it is better to entreat God to make speed to save us than that we should hasten forth to our duties, to the neglect of prayer.

One who knew Luther well wrote thus to Melancthon: "I cannot enough admire the extraordinary cheerfulness, constancy, faith and hope of a man in these trying and vexatious times. He constantly feeds these gracious affections by a very diligent study of the Word of God. Then not a day passes in which he does not employ in prayer at least three of his very best hours. Once I happened to hear him in prayer. Gracious God! What spirit and what faith there is in his expression. He petitions God with as much reverence as if he was in the divine presence, and yet with as much confidence as he would address a father or a friend."

The great Wilberforce wrote to his son: "Let me counsel you not to be seduced into neglecting, curtailing or hurrying over your morning prayer. Of all things, guard against neglecting God in the closet. There is nothing more fatal in the life and power of religion. How much better I might serve God if I cultivated a closer communion with him." Haste in prayer means fever and failure. Time spent in prayer is time saved. F. B. M.

The Vision of the Spirit

TUESDAY, April 20. Job 42: 5. "I have heard thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eyes see thee." "A true Christian may be almost deaf," said Newman, "as one who has a ruling sense of God's presence."

He had this ruling sense of the presence of God; his vision throughout adverse circumstances and affliction of the changeless God was the secret of his character.

One of the great boons that prayer brings to the Christian is the sense of God coming into our open souls when we leave behind the sin and the obstructing medium of our cares, getting a vision of him "whose dwelling is the light of setting suns." Like Paul, we live on these visions, and when clouds gather about our heads we repeat with him, "Have I not seen Jesus Christ?" But we are not to wait for great sorrow, nor need we live in a past vision, in order that we may have this perpetual sense of God in the soul. We recall the prayer of George Dawson: "We pray thee that no greatness of ancient testimonies may hide from us the sense of thy continuous presence today." The depth and strength of our characters depends upon the frequency and the vividness of these visions of God.

What makes a man's work successful? Perseverance, more than anything else, perhaps. Wesley said he had no genius: "I can just plod," said he. But perseverance is the product of vision more than we realize. John Paton, the great missionary to the New Hebrides, said that the memory of his father, with bowed head, praying for him on the hilltop outside Glasgow, when the young man left for his long work in the mission field, was the vision that made a print on his soul. It sustained him in days of trial.

Thus we look back to the bright golden days when God walked with us on the shining road, and we keep on plodding. No obstacle or fear can rob us of the hope born of these great moments of communion with the Unseen. Today I will renew this "vision splendid" because I believe his word: "Then shall ye seek me and find me, when ye shall seek me with all your heart." C. S. C.

His Word a Daily Banquet, Giving Life and Strength

WEDNESDAY, April 21. John 6: 30-40. "Lord, evermore give us this bread!" Bread communicates to our bodies the life forces which the wheat-plant has extracted from the sun and atmosphere and soil. These are conveyed to us through the medium of corn. So the Word of God, like the nature of our Lord, conveys to us the power and love and glory of the eternal world, the world of reality, the true origin and home of our souls. There is need for us to read the Scriptures deeply, carefully, intensely. Sooner may a furnace glow without coals than the heart keep earnest and prayerful apart from the absorption of our soul in the Scriptures of Truth. They have derived their power to help, comfort and enkindle us from Jesus Christ. We derive from coal the light and heat that vegetation absorbed from sunshine in primeval ages; and we obtain from the Bible what the Christ-Spirit imparted to its writers. "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." "They are they which testify of me."

George Müller tells us of a remarkable conclusion to which his experience led him. At one time his practice was to give himself to prayer, so soon as he had dressed; but his plan underwent a change. "I saw that the most important thing I had to do was to give myself to the reading of God's Word, and to meditate on it, that my heart might be comforted, encouraged, warned and instructed, and be thus brought into experimental communion with the Lord. As the result, I have found that after a few minutes my soul has been led to confession, intercession, or supplication." But, again, we must not read the Scripture mechanically. We must ask the Lord Jesus to break it to us. As we open our Bibles we should say: "Evermore give us [give me] this bread." F. B. M.

The Spirit That Uplifts the World

THURSDAY, April 22. Genesis 6: 8. "But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord." Noah was the Bible's first great preacher of righteousness, the first great reformer. Abel was removed from his evil environment, Enoch was translated, Cain was driven out to be a wanderer on the face of the earth; but Noah stayed where he was and tried to make things better by showing the people that they were following a wrong ideal, that every imagination of their thoughts was evil continually. Speaking not long ago in India with a prominent Hindu Brahman, the latter said to the writer that he felt the times were out of joint in Western civilization, and that materialism and shrewd utilitarianism were coming with a rush into thoughtful, spiritual India, crushing out the higher things of the spirit. As a result of this misled economic and earthly ambition, he saw a decadence in the development and spiritual regeneration of the individual. He therefore was soon to follow his ancestors' example, and at the age of fifty-five would renounce the world, departing into the desert to become a "sanyassi," living thereafter a life of meditation.

Many men have felt this desire. Noah must have felt it, but he stayed. He faced his time, he looked the evils squarely in the face and he gave his life to the endeavor of showing men their mistakes and assisting them in the reconstruction of their careers upon loftier principles.

On many sides we hear, during these days of world warfare, that men have been exchanging their Christian ideals for Napoleonic principles; that men have a "wrong idea of glory," preferring brute force and physical well-being to the unutterable peace of right hearts and right thoughts. The world, we say, is tuned to a wrong note—to the song of the sword, not to the song of the spirit.

It is a good time to remember Noah. He saw things steadily and he saw them whole. He warned men that no permanence, no rest to the soul, can be built merely on a physical foundation. Among a multitude who lost their faith through the terror and confusion of circumstances, Noah believed God, and saw beneath the Rainbow of Promise the eternal hope that God would never leave his world.

God "Working in Us"—What It Means

FRIDAY, April 23. Philippians 2: 12-18. "Work out... it is God which worketh in you." Salvation is an all-including word. It stands not only for our deliverance from the just penalty of our sins, but for the whole process through which we are cleansed, purified, sanctified and conformed to the image of our Lord. It includes that feeding on the Word of God and those habits of prayer which are above all things necessary to our growth in grace and knowledge of our Lord and Saviour.

At times it seems easy to ascend to these glorious heights. We mount up with wings as eagles, we run and are not weary. Not infrequently, however, our soul tires and faints. The wings of aspiration are clipped. We scourge ourselves, but cannot force our lethargic natures to take the heavenward way.

At such times especially, but at all times generally, we should turn from our good selves, as we do from our bad, and direct our thoughts to the Spirit of God who is within us. Deep in our subconscious nature he is at work, and often at a depth which is beyond the reach of our consciousness.

Oh, the depth of the love of God! There he is willing and working. His will is our sanctification, prayerfulness and holiness, and presently, as we watch and wait, we shall find that will informing and inspiring our own. We shall yearn with inexpressible desire. The Spirit will witness with our spirits and yearn in us with jealous envy for the exclusion of all evil and the attainment of all good. Nay, more, he will work in us. We shall be empowered, enabled, possessed. The power to be what we have been led to desire will be granted. Every desire of goodness will be fulfilled. It will be possible and easy then to work out all that God is working in for our perfect salvation. F. B. M.

Our Lives Here Should Begin Heaven on Earth

SATURDAY, April 24. Hebrews 7: 16. "The power of an endless life." Life here is the seed-time, death the open gateway into the endless life. Our life here is a life of heaven on earth. It is not that we would desire to live forever in an aimless life, but to live in the activities of a future that will be more useful and glorious than this.

If an artist who has outlined a great painting should wantonly destroy it at its beginning, he would be doing what some believe God will do with us at the end of this life—blot us out. The power of the endless life is the power of God. We walk as seeing the invisible. Deut. 11: 21: "As the days of heaven upon the earth"—that is, as long as the heavens are above the earth, which means forever. Thus the Jewish nation was promised to prosper if they were true to God. It means a forever life to all who love God. John saw it in his heavenly vision. It is the same figure as the one "as the heavens are higher than the earth." One is a type of God's greatness; the other of his everlastingness. We must aim at the beyond, not at the little things of time. Our days here may seem dark and turbulent, but they will be glorified soon. Christ's life was full of sorrow, but now he dwells in light eternal. E. W. C.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

ONE effect of the war which will in all probability be lasting, and which will be a permanent advance in good government, good morals and the increased efficiency of a large portion of the human race, is the practical abolition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic drinks in many of the combatant nations, and the prospect that nearly all of those nations which have not already taken prohibitive action will very shortly do so. A review of what has actually happened may be interesting.

Russia, to begin with, has practically prohibited the manufacture, sale or gift of any drink containing alcohol in all the dominions of the Czar. This affects a hundred and seventy-one million people, among whom a large number were very heavy drinkers.

France has absolutely prohibited the manufacture and sale of that terrible poison, absinthe, in France and her colonies, and further legislation looking to the absolute prohibition of many kinds of so-called spirits is pending in the French Parliament.

Germany has forbidden the use of spirits by the soldier, and made it a criminal offense to offer them to a soldier, either for sale or as a gift. This week Egypt has followed the example of France and prohibited the sale or use of absinthe in her territory.

The agitation in England on this subject is rapidly reaching a climax. The chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Lloyd-George, has declared that drink is the greatest enemy Great Britain has to fight. Lord Kitchener has added his influence to the movement, and hundreds of influential men of all classes of the nation have petitioned Parliament to take drastic action on the question. The king in an open letter has promised to set the example by banishing from his table, during the war, all forms of beverages containing alcohol. The consensus of opinion seems to be that the length of the war will be considerably affected, favorably, if prohibition legislation be generally adopted. The increased drinking among English women, which has grown to be a public scandal and menace, would then be immediately stopped.

The matter is now before the British cabinet, and undoubtedly in the next few days some course of action will be determined upon which, if not prohibitory, will be nearly so. It is figured that the revenue derived from taxes on this class of drink, which would be lost, would be far more than made up by the increased efficiency of all classes.

Among the half-dozen papers in London which count is the Economist, which is peculiarly the mouthpiece of the financial interests and men of capital, and which plays a rôle in the business life of the city which is without parallel among the papers of like class in America.

In its issue of Friday, March 26, it thus expresses itself: "As soon as the main issues for which we are fighting can be achieved, it is just as much the duty of our statesmen to make peace as it was in the view of Sir Edward Grey to make war at the end of July last. The time may come before long when it will be possible to consult the dictates of humanity and at the same time secure the objects indicated by Sir Edward Grey. If such an opportunity is lost the war will not go on forever. It will end in revolutionary chaos."

For some days there have been persistent and somewhat detailed rumors of impending peace in the inner circles of the New York banking interests. Perhaps this statement by the Economist, particularly the phrase, "the time may come before long," is not unconnected with these New York rumors. At the same time there is nothing in either the military or naval situation of the combatants which adds strength to the possibility of an impending peace.

not be said. Anyhow, there is no indication of any concerted action.

The interventionist press in Italy has suddenly within the past week, according to news from a reliable source, completely changed its position, and instead of trying to force the government to plunge into the war at once, states openly and without the slightest ambiguity that there are serious doubts whether such a course would be either advisable or advantageous.

As has been said in these columns, Italy is still a member of the Triple Alliance, and has never taken any step toward ever to dissolve the tie which binds her to Germany and Austria, and were it not for the agitation, more or less irresponsible, of the Garibaldians and the syndicalists, there would have been no reason to seriously believe that there was any probability of Italy deserting her position as a neutral.

The Garibaldians derive a word, Giuseppe Garibaldi, the founder of the family, first came into prominence just before the wars which united Italy. His first exploit was to head the revolution which de-throned the rather ridiculous Bomba of Naples and the Two Sicilies. Thereafter, seeing that he had a certain gift of control over rather turbulent elements of the Italian population, Garibaldi to attach the element to the fortunes of the House of Savoy.

When the war was over which converted the small states of Italy into one kingdom, Garibaldi attempted to assert his views and opinions as to the future of the united Italy created by fusion, he was quietly, gently, but firmly squashed, and for the rest of his life, except for a moment in the Franco-Prussian War of 1870-71, as a spectator rather than an actor.

Such a move would, it is thought, prevent the labor troubles which have recently been the cause of considerable delay in handling war material coming forward to that port.

Trouble of apparently a sporadic nature has taken place on the northwest frontier of India.

Some 10,000 tribesmen, composed mostly of Zadravs, gathered on the other side of the frontier, apparently with the design of attacking Tochi, near the Miranshah frontier post. On the morning of the 26th these tribesmen were attacked by Indian Government troops, under General Fane, and put to flight after a fight, with a loss of some 500 in casualties. The British casualties are not stated. There have been rumors lately, more or less vague, of unrest in India and to the westward, whether as a result of the declaration of the holy war or not can-

A SERBIAN EMERGENCY AMBULANCE

PALESTINE MISSIONS AND THE WAR

FROM A MISSIONARY CORRESPONDENT IN JERUSALEM

THE missionary societies of England had called most of their missionaries home from Palestine in September, but those in charge of the institutions found it very difficult to leave their work and were still at their posts as late as December. Those in the outstations were brought into Jerusalem, under escort of soldiers, and kept in the city as prisoners of war until December 22 when they were allowed to leave the country or remain at their own risk. Already the institutions had been withdrawn and foreign post offices closed; the soldiers had been sent on to the villages to get food from the poor peasants again and again. The shops in the cities had been plundered until merchants had nothing left to sell—that is, in the food line—all the suffering and poverty were increasing daily. French, Russians and Egyptians, Jews, monks and nuns had been driven out of the land by thousands, and all British subjects saw that it was their opportunity to go. Their schools, hospitals and angelistic work had been ceased and many of their buildings taken possession of by the Turks for the use of the officers and soldiers, and to be used as hospitals for the wounded. So, leaving their homes as well protected as possible, they left for Jfa.

They had great difficulty in passing through the Custom House and embarking, as orders had been received from Constantinople forbidding them to leave until certain negotiations could be made concerning a notable Turkish prisoner in London. At the United States consul, Dr. Glasebrook, proved to have great influence with the officials. His dealings with the people regained their confidence and esteem because of his affability and uprightness and Christian courtesy. He wrought faithfully that of explaining, persuading and insisting that the promise having been given should not be broken. All objections and expostulations being finally overcome, the last British subject—who was being detained because he did not wear the regulation clerical collar—was set free and all reached their boat with thankful hearts.

THAT same day the Turkish commander-in-chief, Zaky Bey, who had given them the permits to leave, was deposed and Djamal Pasha, a strong or Arabic. But there were other demands intended to be made to which we could not agree, so we do not know how long we may continue our work. All these difficulties had drawn us more closely together than formerly, and there was much prayer and unity of spirit. The London Jews' Society were still caring for a few of their boys and girls, orphans who had no homes. The German missions were sadly crippled because their people were unable to provide the necessary funds, but they were doing their very best for many. Our American schools were still in progress, except our Girls' Boarding School, which we closed January 21, as it was not deemed wise to keep so many girls together, in case the defeated army returned from Egypt.

It was a great grief to us to send so many girls to their home villages, as they have no one to instruct them and in many cases it meant great privation and hardship and perhaps starvation. I rejoice to hear that already the Christian Herald has sent funds to our faithful, efficient consul, Dr. Glasebrook, and trust that more may be sent. All may feel assured that the money will be used to the very best advantage possible.

PROPHECY is fulfilling so rapidly that we must not sleep longer lest we be found with no oil in our lamps. Truly the "times of the Gentiles" have closed. According to the Palestinian covenant, given in Leviticus 26, the Gentile supremacy over the land had continued exactly the seven times, i.e., 2,520 years, and the war began "on the selfsame day," the ninth day of Ab, according to the Jewish reckoning. God is preparing the land for the restoration of his chosen people. America has the privilege, in this time of crisis, of working with God to accomplish his own purpose for his land and his people.

He has said: "And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee." And the United States of America is the only so-called Christian nation that has not persecuted the Jew—the only one that has blessed the Jew.

O God, who shaped the mountains high,
Who made the fields, the grassy plain,
Who sent the breeze, the gentle rain,
Who filled with blue the peaceful sky,
Oh, let thy healing Spirit lie
Within our hearts. We feel thy care;
We know that thou art everywhere,
To keep our souls from sin and stain.
God, hear our cry!

Thy sheep are grazing on the green;
They have no cares they would release;
The very shadows on their fleece
Are violet-tinted, and the scene
Is beautiful, and calm, and clean.
They do not worry, do not pine,
Because they are so wholly thine.
We beg a vestige of their peace.
On thee we lean!

God of the mountains, of the sheep,
Watch gently o'er our evening sleep.

PLACATING MARY PETERS

BY FLORENCE HAINES-REED

Author of "Three Shots," "Bread on the Waters," "Comin' Through the Dip"

MARY PETERS peered cautiously around the kitchen door into the dining-room where Jim, her matrimonial partner, was making violent efforts to read the weekly news garnered from the town environs and compressed into the Titusville Courier.

She resumed her dishwashing with the resentfully puckered and vigorously admonished the flowers to come to the best "chiny" dishes. The Titusville Courier was disgraced. In personal Mary had been classified as "weakly" visitor to Sulphur Hot Springs. The personal grilled deep. The Springs "wuz a genuine invalids' place," and Mary had always prided herself on being as strong as the horses she drove at hayin' time.

"I'll never read that paper ag'in. Now you kin bear to hev' the thing around, Jim Peters, is more'n I know. The words ain't spelled right and the ammar's awful!" Jim continued to read the paper, though Mary's teeth clicked every time he asked if the paper had come;

and when Mary's teeth clicked he knew she was always in dead earnest about something. She read the temperance quarterlies, the almanac, clothes and seed catalogues and the city papers, which she piled in the closet after the city boarders left, for her winter's reading.

When Amanda Evans, belle of the town, was married, the most important event which had stirred Sharpsville since Meecham's "crick" washed the bridge away, she got her news verbatim from Molly Garner, town historian. When the Masons' new home was described at length in the society column, Mary nearly expired with curiosity to know how they had furnished a house with "a livin' room and no parlor." And the missionary meeting was a whole week away.

Mary was "among those present" at Jed Hodges' funeral, and the paper went to her cousin after Jim had underscored the elite names that happened in the typographical vicinity of "Peters."

"Hes the paper come, Mary?"

She sniffed a peppery explosive.

"It's there some'ers. I ain't keepin' track o' it."

Jim scraped the lamp nearer his eyesight, gave the rocking-chair an extra hunch, which made it shriek in protest, adjusted his spectacles at a perilous angle on his Roman fortification, and unfolded the emissary of the community.

Mary settled with her sewing as near to the light as she could get, considering the available space was blocked by a chain containing her husband's stockinged feet. She stabbed her mending with the diligence of accentuated perturbation.

"Wall, I'll be switched ef Ed Wheat ain't sold his house to them city folks that boarded here las' summer."

"I warrant they'd be good neighbors." Then she considered the informing source. "Well, I hope et's true, but you can't put no account in thet paper."

"The Browns hes got a baby and a new calf. They're goin' to call the baby Elizybeth. Don't say what they named the calf." Jim chuckled modestly over his facetiousness.

"Wall, Mary, I do declar' ef here ain't yer speech you made to the temperance meetin'—and it's got kind of a character sketch, telling how you're one of the strong lights o' the feminine community."

"Jim!"

Mary extended her fingers in a five-horse-power clutch to get the proof of her public glorification. Jim, remembering the electricity which usually flashed around his name when it was isolated with an exclamation point, acted out a meek essay on silence. Mary remembered to remember her vow.

"Don't place much account in et. They've prob'ly jumbled et all up so's you can't make head ner tail o' what I said." The velocity of the chair increased almost to precipitation.

She looked pathetically at Jim, buried in the front page, unaware that his superior three-quarters were quivering with suspense.

"Choice Appointments"

HE REFERRED to the manner in which choice city appointments are secured by some, while others are left in the hills. "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head." "Whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple." "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily and follow me."

The first paragraph is from the newspaper report of an address made by a modern clergyman, pleading before a body of his fellow workers for some plan which would safeguard the interests of pastors. The last paragraph is a cluster of quotations from the lips of Jesus of Nazareth. The last sentence of this second paragraph occurs, with slight variation, three times in the Gospels. Thrice are the words recorded: "Let him deny himself." Let him deny himself. "Let him deny himself."

Yet Christian ministers squabble among themselves for that "first place," which Jesus commanded his followers not to seek. One is sometimes tempted to think that the time is ripe for a new order of ecclesiastics who will retake the long-forgotten vow of "poverty."

Thank God there are multitudes of noble souls in the pulpits of all the denominations who think much of their message and little of their pay. But there are others whose minds are too largely on the salaries—greedy for the big places that others get, chafing at the economies required by their own small incomes.

Money, in one phase or another, has been almost the arch-curse of the church. We have forgotten Christ's fiery words: "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." We have forgotten "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, though he was rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might become rich"—not rich in gold and lands, but rich in faith, in sacrifice, in humility, in good works.

Most ministers get too little pay. Some get far too much. But the strife among ministers for the more lucrative pulpits is one of the most deadly faults of the church. During these days of nationwide revival, when rich and poor, students and laborers, young and old, are heeding the call of the Master and yielding their lives to his sway, it is most unfortunate that contests among clergymen for preferment and emoluments must be witnessed. We would urge all our ministerial friends to remember again what that word "minister" really means, "a servant," and in the light of this recollection to read again Christ's earnest words: "Ye know that they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and their great ones exercise authority upon them. But so shall it not be among you; but whosoever will be great among you shall be your minister; and whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all."

How a Woman Saved Easter

HOW a woman's wit saved the day in the Paterson revival is an incident in the history of a great spiritual campaign that deserves to be remembered. Evangelist Sunday has shown himself to be a general who knows how to marshal his forces against the hosts of sin. He has a system of his own relative to preparatory work, which might be compared to the wonderful system of Von Hindenburg, the hero of the Masurian Lake victories. He leaves no stone unturned which will aid in bringing success in the coming battle. Consequently, in making his agreement with the united Paterson pastors, Evangelist Sunday stipulated that, after all the preparatory work had been done—and tremendous work it was, sometimes 500 prayer meetings being held simultaneously—and when the opening day arrived, no church should hold services in its own building. To this the pastors agreed.

Later, however, when they remembered that the active campaign was to open on Easter Sunday, and when they saw the financial budget of the revival mounting in the thousands, some of the pastors began to have qualms of conscience concerning the Easter collection. How could they get along without it? Would the churches be able to pull through under the unusual financial strain unless they had the benefit of this usually very liberal annual offering? Moved by the spirit of revolt against an arrogant rule, some of the churches decided to hold the usual Easter service in the forenoon. When the evangelist heard of the decision, he promptly insisted that the original agreement should be kept, otherwise—no revival! The Easter service program was thereupon abandoned.

But to give up Easter was a regrettable sacrifice, and it was at this juncture that the wise brain of a clever, tactful Christian woman came to the rescue. Mrs. Garret A. Hobart, the widow of the late Vice-President of the United States, an active churchwoman, and chairman of the Women's General Committee, called the committee of members and pastors together. She wrote a telegram to the evangelist, which appealed equally to the evangelist's gallantry and to his sense of justice. It read:

"If you could say, 'Open your churches for Easter services and then join with me in the afternoon in the greatest religious demonstration that Paterson has ever known,' the entire city would be with you for your generous act."

Evangelist Sunday opened, read and surrendered! Even Von Hindenburg couldn't have withstood such an appeal. Mr. Sunday was ready to meet the issue with all the ministers of the city, the county, or even the entire state; but here was an appeal he could not resist; and so he wired back to Mrs. Hobart within an hour, gladly consenting to the holding of the Easter services in the churches. It was a wise backdown and a happy way out of a disagreeable dilemma. The honors of the situation clearly remain with the clever woman who induced General Sunday to modify his plans in the interest of peace and harmony and a successful revival.

College Students Turn to Christ

THE recent revival at Yale took but little time. Four formal meetings were held, addressed by Mr. Sherwood Eddy, but these were attended by about eleven hundred of the twenty-five hundred undergraduates, and it is estimated that five hundred made the decision to accept Christ. Many more were profoundly impressed, and the special four-day campaign was followed by daily meetings. The campaign was preceded by dormitory and fraternity house meetings, and some consecrated members of the faculty arranged special meetings for the professors and instructors, one hundred of whom attended regularly for six nights. Observers recall the meetings at Yale conducted by John R. Mott and Robert E. Speer fifteen years ago, the earlier meetings held under the leadership of the beloved Professor Drummond of Glasgow, and the still earlier revival in the days of Horace Bushnell.

Mr. Eddy's recent amazing evangelistic experiences among the students of China fitted him in unique fashion for this Gospel campaign at one of New England's great conservative universities. He had previously held successful meetings at the University of Pennsylvania. Billy Sunday also made a helpful impression upon the U. P. students, and later was heard eagerly by the men of Princeton. The movement at Princeton was so promising that special help was sent from Yale to carry on the Gospel meetings there.

The common people still hear Jesus gladly, but the young successors of Nicodemus, Gamaliel, Paul, Calvin, Luther, Wesley, Edwards, continue to prove that his Gospel can appeal to minds trained to think, and become to them "the power of God unto salvation." Christian America rejoices that in the early days of this year, which promises to be for our country in a special sense a "year of grace," its students as well as its workers, its children, its business men and its women are finding their way to the Cross of Christ.

Militarizing the Schools and Colleges

MILITARISM has strong advocates both in and out of Congress. Representative Gardner wants a regular army of 200,000 men, and Congressman Parker appeals for a reserve militia of 16,000,000 strong. Colonel Roosevelt wants our navy doubled and Admiral Chadwick lifts his voice for eighty battleships, with cruisers and submarines in proportion, at a total cost of $600,000,000. One project, which has a dangerous aspect on the part of a neutral nation, looks to the formation of an "American Legion," the promoters of this jingo scheme being a certain class of wealthy men who have vested interests at stake which they desire to have protected in the event of the nation going to war. They are not moved by patriotic course, but by personal interests. But it is more surprising to note how the military fever attacked our colleges. Professor Richard wants all boys at school and college to drill from the ages of twelve to twenty-five, and then the reserve. Other professors have succumbed to the same influence, but we believe that the sense of Americans generally will revolt against such a scheme. While physical drill and exercise are desirable as a part of the training of our boys and young men, the proposition to liberally devote a large part of the time that should be spent in mental training to equipment for service in the battlefield, will be instantly challenged.

Was it not Goethe who wrote that when the children of a nation play at soldiers, they must look out for war? The spirit of the child develops into the spirit of the man, and familiarity with weapons produces the love and use of such weapons. One of the most shocking things about the present situation in Europe is the militarizing of youth. Boys, whose athletic sports till now have been the wholesome games of the ballfield and gymnasium, are taken from their studies and drilled and disciplined in the great game of war. Instead of learning those qualities that make for nobility of character, they are taught the Satanic art of wholesale murder. True patriotism is perverted and the sense of right and wrong obscured, and what Christianity has stamped as the greatest of human crimes ceases to be regarded as a crime at all. Race hatred and antagonism are unavacably instilled, the spirit of Christ is obliterated, the genius of scientific destruction usurps the place of the highest ideal. It does not surprise us, then, that, uniting with sister organizations abroad, the women of America should have voiced a protest against this desecration of childhood and youth. As guardians of the future generations they have a right to demand that their offspring shall be dedicated to slaughter and trained to be foemen for the cannon. Our seminaries and colleges would do well to beware of being drawn into the raps of militarism. God forbid that we should carve out such a destiny for our sons!

The Dante Anniversary

PLANS are being perfected for the celebration in May of the six hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the birth of Dante. The world's interest in Dante is far more than in rest in a poet. He was a poet, but he was more. He was a prophet, a pioneer of truth and freedom. Withal, he was an arch-lover, a tender, caste, ardent, inspired disciple of love.

But it is Dante's place in history as a teacher of religious truth and as a protester against the errors and corruptions of the Church of Rome that is of greatest interest to evangelical Christians. He has long been recognized as the greatest Reformation reformer. Two hundred years before Luther's time he insisted upon placing the authority of the Scriptures above the authority of the pope, condemned the custom of granting indulgences, opposed the veneration of saints, and manifested his dauntless courage—perhaps at the expense, somewhat, of his standing as a meek and gentle saint—by condemning, in his "Divine Comedy," three successive Popes to the tortures of hell. He foresaw the Reformation, and declared that it would come, not from the papal, but from the civil authority. He advocated stanchly in his "De Monarchia," the principle of the separation of church and state, writing his treatise in support of the emperor against the claims of Boniface VIII to temporal power.

The doctrines of evangelical Christianity came in the lines of the Divine Comedy. The atonement, salvation by Christ alone, he saw and announced. Modern Christians lament the fury of his descriptions of the sufferings of lost souls, but rejoice that in the darkness and corruption of the Middle Ages this brave and gifted man found and proclaimed so much of Gospel truth.

Who can think of Dante without remembering Beatrice? A vague, mysterious, bewitching character, she shines ever above the image of the poet himself. He possessed her not on earth, but in the heavenlies. And his pure love, his obedient following of the light she shed upon his life, are a constant challenge to every true man to follow the purest and highest star that shines for his own soul.

Sir George Turner's Martyrdom

SIR GEORGE TURNER died recently at Plympton, Devon, of leprosy contracted in South Africa during research work to discover a cure for that disease. Sir George worked for many years in South Africa and discovered a cure for the cattle plague. He also served as medical officer of health in Cape Colony and the Transvaal and later was engaged in research in England. He was born in Melbourne in 1851. Dr. Turner's most important achievements were in South Africa, where he not only discovered a serum which stamped out the rinderpest and checked an epidemic of typhoid fever in military hospitals and concentration camps during the Boer War, but gave up his life to the service of lepers. He first became interested in a leper asylum at Pretoria while fighting against the second scourge of the cattle plague in 1901. After several years' work among the lepers after his retirement from his health service upon reaching the age limit he found that he had contracted leprosy. With certain death awaiting him he gave himself cheerfully to the task of ministering to his fellow sufferers, and in prosecuting his search for a remedy that would stamp the loathsome disease from the face of the earth. He was a real nobleman. "Not like the dumb, driven cattle," he was "a hero in the strife." In his death in his search for life for others he copied the example and partook of the spirit of the blessed Saviour, who laid down his life that others might live. What a burden of obligation there is on us to live for him who died for us, thus expressed: "He died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again." (II Cor. 5: 15.)

President Addresses Conference

PRESIDENT WILSON'S address to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in Washington the other day was of general interest. After the President had been introduced by Bishop Warren A. Candler of Atlanta, Ga., he said among other things: "I feel that I am looking in the faces of men and women who are not interested in the temporary but in the permanent things, things that are good for the healing of this nation not only but for the healing of all the nations. This is not a council of peace, not to form a plat of peace, but to proclaim the single supreme plan of peace, the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ; because wars will never have any ending until men cease to hate one another, cease to be jealous of one another, get that feeling of reality in the brotherhood of mankind which is the only bond that can make us think justly of one another, and act righteously before God himself. I look upon bodies like yours as the stabilizers of the nation. You have your compasses and know the moral changing of the world. We know what haven we are bound for. We know the only legitimate process by which one can work his way against the tradewinds of evil in the world, to the haven desired." The moral steadfastness of Christians to which the President referred is thus enjoined: "Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord." (I Cor. 15: 58.)

Killed with a Nail

CHARLES G. HEUSER, a Montana ranchman, started from his home with a thousand dollars in money on his body recently for Europe to enlist in the German army. He took steerage passage on a ship at Jersey City, and on the day set for sailing his body was found in a coal bunker of the vessel. It was at first thought that he had been smothered to death. But the county physician discovered a scalp wound and a round hole in his skull, which indicated that the robbers had driven a long nail into his brain and killed him. They got seven hundred dollars of the man's money, but three hundred dollars in German coin they did not discover. What four things will not avarice do! It will take the neighbor's money by too sharp dealing, by falsehood and by fraud; it will pick the pocket; it will break into the house in the dead of night and steal it; take the purse on the highway. It so often employs murder to do its diabolical work, in secur-

CHILDREN'S DENTAL HOSPITAL DEDICATED

A DENTAL hospital was dedicated to the children of Boston recently, the gift of two Forsythe brothers, costing a million dollars. A nominal fee of five cents a tooth is charged for treatment. The institution has in its employ seventy skilled dentists, some of them women, and five hundred dollars are expended as an equipment for each dentist. This is a unique and beautiful charity. The condition of the teeth has much to do with the health, happiness, and good temper of people of all ages. As a rule the teeth of children have been neglected, and sometimes they have suffered through life as a result. This is said to be the only institution of the kind in the world. This princely gift to the children of Boston was in the spirit of the Saviour who loved the children so: "And he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them." (Mark 10: 16.)

ing the provision in the will, the money on the insurance policy, the coin in the stocking or chest in the house. The greatest dramatists of the world have not overdrawn the picture in their scathing denunciations of the relation between avarice and the bloodiest of crime. There is this mention of the killing of a man with a nail: "Then Jael Heber's wife took a nail of the tent, and took a hammer in her hand, and went softly unto him [Sisera], and smote the nail into his temples, and fastened it into the ground: for he was fast asleep and weary. So he died." (Judges 4: 21.)

Railroad Men's Christian Association

THE editor of the Railway Age Gazette has been interviewing a number of the officers of the leading railroads in the country to ascertain how far the Railroad Branches of the Young Men's Christian Associations have contributed to the personal comfort, the mental and moral benefit of the men for whom they were organized. Most favorable reports of the splendid work done were received and given to the readers of the magazine in two successive issues. The report of the general superintendent of the Lackawanna Railroad voices the general commendation in these words: "The Railroad Branch of the Y. M. C. A. is a real asset to the railroad. It has raised the standard of the men and improved their condition by giving them an opportunity to spend the day or night at their lay-over point, away from their home terminal, amid proper surroundings, where good, plain food is furnished, and clean sleeping-quarters provided at low cost, and where their thoughts are turned in the right direction to have them lead better lives and to fulfil their duties to the public, to the railroad, to their co-workers, and to themselves and their families. I do not see how we could get along without the Railroad Y. M. C. A." God raised up the Y. M. C. A. as one of the most powerful instrumentalities of his for the salvation and betterment of the race. And now later Providence has called up the Y. W. C. A. to do the corresponding work in behalf of the young women of the land. Any one who has ever visited a railroad Y. M. C. A. and seen the stalwart, rugged, brave conductors, engineers, brakemen and other employees will verify the commendations of the work given by the representatives of the railroads in the railway magazine. The ministry to these men calls to mind these words: "The glory of young men is their strength." (Prov. 20: 29.)

Girl Prodigy in Scholarship

WINIFRED SACKVILLE STONER, a girl of twelve years of age, daughter of Dr. James B. Stoner, in command of the Marine Hospital in Pittsburg, is credited with a precocity truly astounding. It is claimed that she speaks eight languages, has written a number of story books for small children, is a teacher in the Carnegie Institute in Pittsburg, and is ready to pass her entrance examinations for college. In an interview in a leading New York City daily the mother explains her daughter's wonderful scholarly attainments. Ordinarily it is best not to push a child too fast in books, in the interest of physical health and of mental thoroughness. Geniuses are rare. It is the plodders that do most of life's work. The brilliant mental attainments of this child of twelve call to mind this description of the value of wisdom: "She is more precious than rubies, and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her." (Prov. 3: 15.)

Telephone Operator Saves Lives

THE chief operator of the Flatbush Telephone Exchange, Miss Mary M. Gildea, received the congratulations of friends on having saved the lives of three persons from asphyxiation at the home of Asad Khouli, a business man. Central was called from the residence by a woman who gasped "Oh, come quick!" Then there was a thud as of a body falling to the floor. The operator immediately called up the Brooklyn Police Headquarters and the Kings County Hospital. The policemen got there first, and forcing their way into the house found it full of gas. Beside the telephone, in the dining-room, they found Mrs. Khouli unconscious on the floor, and in an adjoining room on a couch was her aunt, also unconscious, and in the basement Mr. Khouli, almost dead. The ambulance and the surgeon sent from the hospital arrived soon after the policemen and immediately and vigorously applied restoratives and brought them all back to life. It was only the quick wit and immediate action of the telephone girl that saved the three lives. It is likely that sixty seconds' delay would have been too late, and a triple tragedy would have been the result. It is a beautiful thing to save the bodies of our fellows, a still more beautiful thing to save their souls. So many are in peril; some may be in such imminent danger that a day's or hour's delay in rescuing them may be too late. The action in saving these people who were almost lost calls to mind that of the One who saved lost souls: "For the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." (Luke 19: 10.)

Death of William Jay

COLONEL WILLIAM JAY'S death on March 28 removed from the stage one of our most conspicuous and valuable lawyers and citizens. His great-grandfather was John Jay, of the Supreme Court of the United States. William Jay was a major in the Civil War, and was made lieutenant-colonel for gallant service. After the war he became a foremost practitioner of law in New York City. He was at the head of many of the leading business enterprises of the country. He was a friend to education, to fine art, to large benevolence, to healthy sport. He was a true Christian man and supporter of all the departments of the church, and his loss to the city, state, country and kingdom of God will be deeply felt. The secret of his success was his ability and intimate relationship with God. This secret of earthly success is here recorded: "And the Lord was with Joseph, and he was a prosperous man." (Gen. 39: 2.)

THE first report from our relief committee in Vienna is given below in free translation, and it is our expectation that reports from all sections where the work is going on will follow in successive weeks. We have already printed those from Belgium, England and France.

Vienna, February 23, 1915.

TO THE highly esteemed management of the Christian Herald, New York:

The Austrian Relief Committee of the Christian Herald, New York, for the relief of the widows and orphans of the war in Europe, allows itself the privilege of sending best thanks for and acknowledging receipt of 10,000 dollars, which is 55,555 kronen, inasmuch as the committee promised recently to apply the transmitted amount to the best of its knowledge and conscience according to the plans of the donors, thereby to relieve as soon as possible the heavy burden under which the many widows and orphans are suffering through the death of their supporters. At the same time the committee desires to report an account of the development of its activities. In order to reach the needy in all the Austrian provinces the committee has addressed the following to the proper political authorities:

"The now completed committee allows itself to communicate that the evangelical publication, the Christian Herald of New York, has opened a fund for relief of the widows and orphans of those who have fallen in the war. Under the auspices of the consulate general of the United States of America there was organized on the 3d of December in Vienna a committee composed of representatives of the various provinces of Austria, which has undertaken to relieve the needy widows and orphans whose breadwinners have fallen in the war—and this without regard to denomination or creed.

"It is requested that it be announced in the dioceses of the district headquarters, by way of the official papers, or in any other suitable way, and with all possible haste, of the existence of this committee and its purpose, in order that the needy may bring in their petitions for help before this committee.

"The petition blanks, filled in, should be sent to the Austrian Relief Committee of the Christian Herald in Vienna and should contain the following information: Name, age, religion and residence of the petitioner; the number and age of the children, the profession as well as former income of the fallen breadwinner. The accuracy of this information and the necessity for relief can be verified through the local authorities. We at the same time beg that all possible diligence be used."

A copy of this announcement was sent to the authorities of the autonomous cities of Austria, and finally to the councils and county governments, who were urged in every way to endeavor to advance the purpose of the committee. The committee has already received a number of petitions which it speedily took into consideration and which were promptly attended to. An exact accounting of the distribution of the fund will be rendered in due time.

IN THE WAKE OF WAR'S DESTRUCTION

FOR the thousands of new members who have come into the Christian Herald Family in the past six months we wish to speak of the magnificent work which our readers have been doing for the relief of the widows and orphans of the war. Doubtless many of you have already had part in this work. We find that our readers do are distributed to the most needy cases and in the most thorough manner possible, by absolutely reliable volunteer workers. A large number of these character have as readily made in the war region and you could wish, but tribulations sent up to date have forwarded to be employed for the relief of genuine suffering widows and orphans of the war in Belgium, France, England, Germany and Austria, and we are using every means to make satisfactory arrangements in Poland, Galicia, Serbia and wherever war has crushed the armed heel of the defenseless women and children of Europe.

We selected at the start of the movement the widows and orphans of the war as the especial objects of the charity of the Christian Herald Family. It goes without saying that these, first of all, deserve the sympathy and ready aid of Christian people. To visit the widows and fatherless in their affliction is a fundamental duty of the children of God.

We are given to understand that the need throughout Europe cannot be stated in words. Who can picture to himself a whole countryside fleeing in abject terror from their homes, fleeing to no certain refuge; flying in dismay and despair away from every familiar sight to throw themselves upon the mercy of strangers in a strange land? These things cannot be told; they cannot be visualized; they can only be believed. And who will demand that he see for himself the pallid faces of these women, or hear for himself the red-out weeping of the children, or shall feel that divine child alone is the hope of uncounted thousands of these poor creatures today?

The proof that God is still with these woful hearts only through kindness bestowed in the name of Christ. We do not know and cannot even guess the divine purpose in this cataclysm of suffering that has overtaken millions of our fellow beings on the other side of the world. But we can understand, we do not need to guess what the Master would have us do while the calamity lasts. And we renew to all our readers this appeal in behalf of these unspeakably afflicted mothers and children of Europe. Send what your heart dictates, and your purse affords and we will be to it that your gifts of love shall all that human means can extract from money for the relief of human suffering.

You must be patient in looking for reports from the field, as conditions that surround all this work are without precedent, and the first business is to get the money at work. Due time you will hear exactly how your fund has been handled and will have the satisfaction of knowing the great good it has performed.

Please address all gifts to the Widows and Orphans Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

THE WOMEN OF POLAND SMILE NO MORE

The committee has newly added to its organization the president of the Imperial Evangelical Church Council in Vienna and a member of Parliament, Dr. Wolfgang Haase.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

CREAT BRITAIN MAY GO "DRY." There is a temperance wave rising in England which is as sudden as it is apparently overwhelming. The king has given the example by promising to banish liquor from Buckingham Palace, the royal residence, and has sent a letter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer Mr. David Lloyd-George in which he virtually admits that intemperance is seriously interfering with British preparedness in the war. "We are fighting Germany, and Austria, and drink," said the chancellor, addressing a deputation of the Shipbuilding Employers' Federation in London a few days ago; "and, so far as I can see, the greatest of these three deadly foes is drink. With the nation's very existence in peril, the workers are spending their time in carousing, many doing less than half the regular tasks. Nothing short of root-and-branch methods would meet the emergency, and he intimates that the government would not hesitate to go to the farthest lengths in enforcing sobriety. Russia has prohibited vodka; France has shut down on the manufacture of absinthe, and a time seems to have come for England to take a radical step in the same direction. No one would be surprised to learn of the enforcement of prohibition as a war emergency. But would it be confined to the industrial forces or should it go further? On another occasion the chancellor is quoted as saying: "Drink is doing more damage to this country (Great Britain) than all the German submarines put together." In the face of such emphatic utterances, it sounds strangely to read in the columns of the Toronto Guardian the statement that "during the present war the government has contracted for over 500,000 gallons of rum for the use of the soldiery and more than half of this has already been sent to France." Clearly, the responsibility for the situation does not rest solely with the industrial workers, but must be shared by the higher in authority.

EUROPE'S RICHEST BANKER DIES. Baron Nathan May Rothschild, head of the great banking-house known throughout the world, a man of vast wealth and boundless charities, died in London on March 31, aged 74. He was the first Jew ever elected to the British Parliament. The Rothschilds have a wonderful history. The forefathers of the late Baron Nathan were honored and ennobled for the distinguished services they rendered to European governments, some of which they were the means of saving from financial disaster in times of crisis. Anselm Mayer, the founder of the family, was the son of a Frankfurt tradesman, but he proved to be a genius in finance, and when he died in 1812 he left five sons and five daughters. The great bank he established already had branches in Vienna, London, Naples and Paris, the central office being in Frankfurt in the "House of the Red Shield"—whence the family took its surname. The Rothschild's united wealth has been estimated at $2,000,000,000, and the late Baron Nathan was regarded as one of the richest men in Europe. He was, however, more than a mercapitalist and money-lender. Those who knew him most intimately say that he was an inexhaustible source of charity, with a heart ever ready to respond to the appeal of suffering, and the generous patron of a long list of philanthropies to which his gifts were so liberal as to be in some degree commensurate with his vast wealth. It is also recorded of him that he was a man of pure spirit and a leader in movements for social progress.

POPULAR SIGNATURE. A nearly full-blood Cherokee Indian, Houston C. Teehee, son of a chief, has succeeded another Indian as register of the treasury, and all new Federal paper money must now bear his signature to be good.

HAINT VIA HAITI? Expecting that affairs in Haiti would eventually drift into a United States semi-protectorate over the island of the friendly supervision exercised by us over Santo Domingo's finances, the administration has sided its time in confidence that European governments were too much occupied to take a hand in Haiti—as they are supposed to be in respect to Mexico—and now has the dismay of seeing France, Italy and Germany each for itself extend recognition to the Haitian government of General Guillaume Sai who has not been recognized by the United States, thus disavowing American plans for supremacy and also indicating that Europe is not too busy to act in the Western hemisphere if less busy in self-interest.

MISSIONARIES IN PERSIA SAFE. Up to the first of April, there had been no reliable confirmation of the results of a general massacre of native Christians by Turks in Uthia, Persia, and hopes were entertained that the original rumors, which came by way of Tiflis, had been greatly exaggerated. That there have been serious disturbances in and around Urumia, however, is reiterated in despatches from Teiz, received by way of Petrograd, April 1, which state that a battle between Turks and Russians at Salmac Plains, resulting in a Mohammedan reverse, the Russians on entering the village of Haftdewan found 720 mutilated bodies. There were many evidences of a massacre. Some of the victims had been shot, others were bound to ladders and decapitated, while others had had their limbs chopped off, or their eyes gouged before the death-stroke ended their sufferings. Messages from Urumia confirm the stories of the maltreatment of Rev. Dr. E. T. Allen, of the American Mission, and add that over 800 persons have been killed there by the Turks (all Assyrian Christians), while some 2,000 more have died as the result of disease and privation. Turkey, responding to the representations of our State Department, has given assurances of protection for the American missionaries and for any converts to whom they may give asylum within the mission property.

FIVE DIE IN AMERICA FOR THE WAR. By an explosion of over two tons of black powder at the plant of the Equitable Powder Company, five miles from Alton, Ill., April 1, a plant which adjoins that of a big cartridge company, both concerns working under rush ammunition contracts from Europe, five men, including the superintendent of the plant, were killed and many others hurt.

DRASTIC TREATMENT FOR MENTAL DISORDER. Discovering, after he had been in this country for two years, that Nathan Cohen, a Russian Jew, who came here from Brazil in 1912, was insane when he arrived, the immigration authorities in accordance with the law ordered the steamship company to return him to Brazil, which the company painstakingly tried to do. But Brazil declined to receive Cohen back. For over a year he has traveled back and forth on the steamers, each voyage ending in a new rebuff. Hebrew charitable societies here became interested in his case and finally persuaded the authorities to admit him to America until his return to Russia, where he really wants to go, can be arranged, and so, just as the poor fellow was about to start on his fourth useless trip to Brazil, March 27, he was apprised of his better fortune. The prolonged sea journey is said to have much improved his mental condition.

PRESIDENT SHATTERS TRADITION. The presence in Annapolis Roads of the new Argentine battleship Moreno gave President Wilson, on March 29, opportunity to leave American territory contrary to custom and at the same time say a few words to help accelerate what he termed the coming union between the United States and the countries of South America: "A union, not of political ties, but of understanding and of mutual helpfulness." With Secretary of the Navy Daniels, the President boarded the Moreno from the Mayflower and was entertained by the president of the Argentine Naval Commission, Admiral Martin, Ambassador Naon and the ship's commander, Captain Galindez.

BREAK OUT THE FLAG! General Victoriano Huerta is said to have sailed from Spain for Mexico via the West Indies and Yucatan with blue prints of a new revolution by which to free his country, several of his former compatriots being in the plot. He should find the Star-Spangled Banner still courteously waiting his gracious salute. Affairs in Mexico are bad enough without this new menace, and the administration at Washington is said to be growing apprehensive about conditions along the border. Troops are on guard there in readiness for any developments. Through the representations in our behalf of the Brazilian minister to Mexico indemnity to the amount of $20,000 for the killing of McManus has been paid his widow.

SUSPENDED ANIMATION. Much interest has centered in the German cruiser Prinz Eitel Friedrich at Newport News, Va., because of the uncertainty of her plans and the likelihood of an attempt to make a dash for the open sea at the first opportune moment, having one eye on the weather and the other on the allied warships which are watchfully waiting outside the three-mile limit. The Eitel has been coaling and taking on supplies, and United States warships are at hand to preserve American neutrality in any event. If the German boat elects to make a run for freedom, which she must do before Tuesday, April 6 or be interned, if guesses at her time limit are correct, she must first traverse the twenty-mile strait between Cape Charles and Cape Henry and then evade the three British and one French cruisers lined up at intervals of five miles opposite the mouth of the strait. The administration at Washington has filed a claim upon Germany for indemnity for the full value of the clipper William P. Frye, which the Eitel sank, but as the cargo of wheat was shown to be British-owned no claim is made therefor.

NEW AMERICAN NOTE TO ENGLAND. Since the announcement by the British Government of its determination to meet the German naval war zone edict with the most drastic retaliatory measures, President Wilson and the Secretary of State have been giving most serious attention to the preparation of representations from our government in relation to the English policy, and this note, which is believed to be of extraordinary importance, was despatched to Ambassador Page at the end of March, and its contents were to be released for the press of both countries April 1, but owing to the unwillingness of the British premier, Sir Edward Grey, to alter his Easter holiday plans, the note was withheld from the public temporarily, and at the time the Christian Herald goes to press its contents are unknown outside of official circles, though forecasts of its tenor, based on the general gravity of the situation, are disquieting.

OUR NAVAL TRAGEDY UNRELIEVED. Up to April 2 all attempts to bring the lost submarine F-4, lying at a great depth off Honolulu, to the surface or to determine her exact condition have failed, and the Navy Department finds itself confronted with a most difficult piece of work in getting proper apparatus to the scene to reach and lift the boat from her grave. Six expert divers have been sent from the New York Navy Yard and will sail from San Francisco on the cruiser Maryland to aid in this work. No hope is left that any of the crew will be found alive, but the recovery of their bodies is necessary and the Navy Department also is determined to ascertain if possible the cause of the accident so as to guard against a repetition. It is pointed out that the commanding officer of a Japanese submarine, which sank a few years ago with all her crew, left a detailed report of the accident which was found when the craft was recovered.

ORIENTALS LOCK HORNS. China and Japan face each other in serious mood over the latter's unyielding demands for extra-territoriality for Japanese in Manchuria (equivalent to making Manchuria Japanese soil) and other concessions in keeping, President Yuan Shi Kai declaring that China can go no further than to grant to Japan certain commercial advantages secured by special treaty and which really amount to a serious impairment of the "open door" policy in China, in the opinion of other governments. Washington is keeping in close touch with the negotiations, and does not disguise the fact that a crisis seems imminent.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. W. R. B., Los Angeles, Calif. The following is found in an editorial: "Have Faith in God," appearing in the Christian Herald of February 17: "Can we not see that so long as we keep on asking for a blessing our very asking is an acknowledgment that it has not come?" In the book "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered," page 375, the question: "Should we persistently ask for blessings?" is answered: "By all means. The three passages, Matt. 11: 12; Luke 11: 5-10; Luke 18: 1-8, all relate to the subject of earnestness and perseverance in prayer. The argument is that God will surely grant our requests when he sees that we are in desperate earnestness." Please explain the apparent contradiction.

We should persist in prayer till we actually reach the point of faith. To quote again the editorial you mention: "This prayer and this believing are usually necessary to bring us to the place where our souls are receptive of God's bounty." As we have pointed out many times, our chief concern in praying should be to find out God's will. So long as we are not sure what God desires in any matter, we may keep on asking him to do what we wish. We come at length to the point of faith where we believe that he is going to answer our prayer in the way we have been asking. It is the act of believing rather than the act of asking which puts us into that vital touch with God which brings the blessing. But it is clear that so long as we are asking we are not believing. Persistent prayer will bring us to the point of faith. But when faith has come we need no longer ask. Treat God as you would treat any trustworthy, competent friend. If you ask a rich man for money and he hands you a check you do not ask again. You go and cash your check.

Reader, Allentown, Mo. 1. Please define spirituality. 2. Are not all the Christian virtues or characteristics both fruits and gifts of the Holy Spirit?

1. The word spirituality, used in the religious sense, means that state of soul in which one is led and inspired by the Holy Spirit, in which one is conscious of loving God and all that relates to God. Spirituality is like life, or like love, a difficult thing to define but an easy thing to detect. It is often counterfeited. Forms and acts and speech are often fashioned to represent it, but the real is spontaneous, vital, fruitful. We should not form the habit of judging others, but we should pray earnestly for that genuine, heavenly spirituality which means that soul and life are being dominated by the Holy Spirit. 2. Yes. That is, all the Christian graces or characteristics are direct gifts of the Holy Spirit, and then they are the fruits or results of these gifts. The Holy Spirit implants them and then develops them to stronger and higher degrees. It has been the experience of multitudes that after trying in vain to secure such soul qualities as love, joy, peace, gentleness, meekness, patience, they have received these gifts directly through the blessing of the Holy Spirit. It is also true, however, that many people who are not professed Christians, indeed, some in pagan lands, have seemed to attain many of the graces of Christianity, such as meekness, gentleness, humility, kindness, self-control. It is impossible to explain all the subtle workings of the Holy Spirit, who, as Jesus said, is like the wind, of which we hear the sound, but cannot tell whence it comes nor where it goes. But knowing the Gospel and its results, it is our duty to persuade others to attain heavenly character by receiving the Holy Spirit, and, for ourselves, to give the Spirit right of way in our souls as he strives to make us more and more like Christ.

Reader. I regret so many acts and words which I have done and said. Are we always held responsible for all our thoughts? I dwell constantly on wrong things which I have thought and said and done. If I am very penitent and ask to be forgiven, am I pardoned? It is so hard for me to have faith.

God has promised to forgive our sins, and we must try to do the same. It should not be hard to believe that he forgives our sins when he has stated so often and so emphatically that he will do so: "I, even I, am he that blot out thy transgressions" (Isa. 43: 25); "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow" (Isa. 1: 18); "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us" (Ps. 103: 12). After you have trusted Christ to forgive your sins you should give yourself so earnestly and energetically to service for others in his name that you will have little time to think about the past. Some converts make a mistake in dwelling too much on past sins in telling about their redemption. It is sometimes helpful to others to tell of our sins in testifying to God's pardon, but we must be careful not to do it too much. As for responsibility for our thoughts, we have quoted a number of times Wesley's saying, "I cannot prevent the birds from flying over my head, but I can prevent them from building nests in my hair." Thoughts of evil are suggested to us, but we can repel them by our will power, helped by the grace of God.

A reader in Erie, Pa., sends to the Mail-Bag this sprightly and clever little brochure, taken from the weekly bulletin of the Park Presbyterian Church of Erie, and which was read by the pastor, Rev. S. H. Torrey, at the union dinner of the Men's and Women's Bible Classes recently: "Morbus Sabbaticus is a disease peculiar to church-goers. The attack comes on for their medical properties. It is only within recent years that the springs have been accessible by railroad, though for many generations they have enjoyed a fabulous reputation for cures of rheumatism and skin affections. The principal constituents of the hot springs are salt of iron, sulphur, and chloride of soda, and the temperature is at about 95 degrees.

every Sunday; no symptoms are felt on Saturday night; the patient sleeps well, eats a hearty breakfast, but about church time the attack comes on and continues until after the services are over for the morning. Then the patient feels easy and eats a hearty dinner. In the afternoon he feels much better, and is able to take a walk and talk politics; but about church time in the evening he gets another attack and stays at home. He retires early, sleeps well and awakes on Monday, refreshed and able to go to work, and has no symptoms of the disease until the next Sunday.

"The writer suggests a remedy: On Sunday, rise at seven o'clock, use plenty of cold water. Then mix and take internally a dose composed of equal parts of the following ingredients, viz.: Will, Push, Energy, Determination, Respect for the Lord's Day, Respect for the Lord's Book, Respect for the Lord's House. Stir well. Repeat the dose every three minutes till church time, unless relief comes sooner.

"If the day is stormy, an external application of overshoes, rubber coats and umbrellas will be beneficial. Try it."

E. L. J., Oneida, N. Y. Urim and Thummim are Anglicized forms of two Hebrew words which are always used together, except in a single incident in Scripture. They are not proper names, but appellatives. Hebrew scholars hold that Urim means "light" or "fire" and Thummim means "perfection" or "completeness." There are certain authorities, however, who contend that Thummim means "truth" or "to be true." Urim and Thummim together would mean practically "light and perfection." There are various theories mentioned by writers on the subject by way of explaining the uses of the Urim and Thummim. On the breastplate of the high priest were two groups of gems, six on each side of the plate, but whether all the gems or only a certain number of them constituted the Urim and Thummim is uncertain. Kalisch and Lightfoot, two leading interpreters, identify the Urim and Thummim with the twelve Bible gems as a whole. They were apparently employed for oracular uses. If there was any highly important question to be decided, the priest put on his robes and went into the holy place and stood before the altar and made inquiry of the Lord concerning the matter in question. Rabbinical authorities say that the answer was given by certain letters engraved on the stones in the breastplate becoming peculiarly lustrous, in proper order, which could then be translated by the high priest into words. An illustration is found in II Sam. 2: 1 of the use of the priestly oracle when David inquired of God whether he should go up to one of the cities of Judah. The answer was "go up."

Mrs. E. D. E., Cole Camp, Mo., writes: "We like the '555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered' very much. It is a great help to us; yet I come seeking more information. In my Sunday school the question was asked: 'Why did Christ appear first to the woman after the resurrection?' No one gave any opinion but myself. I said I thought that when Christ died he died for all, and it showed that he put woman on an equal standing with man, which was not the custom in olden times. Was I right?" No where can we find any evidence to show that reaching power of human influence, as Durbin on one notable occasion made this statement: "If Peter had won three thousand disciples day after Pentecost, and if his apostolic successors had had religion enough to do anything, it would have taken a thousand years to bring the world to Christ, as the world was on Peter's day, and there would have been new generations unaccounted for; if each of the three thousand had gone out to save one a year, and each new disciple had done the same, the entire world would have been for Jesus Christ a whole generation before the Gospel of John was written."

The Russian soldier wears a beret badge, the French soldier has a decoration card stitched into his tunic, a German soldier a little metal disc bearing his identification marks and an aluminum Japanese soldier has three discs, all on the neck, another in his belt and boot; the Austrian has a gunmetal belt shape, with identification on a tiny leaf within. The Turk is the only soldier so lightly valued that he carries no identification evidently being regarded as

PUENTE DEL INCA

One of the natural marvels to be seen in South America is the famous Puente del Inca, or Inca Bridge, originally one of the old Indian passes through the Andes. It is situated in the heart of the Andes, spanning the River Cuevas at a height of 65 feet. It has a span of 70 feet, and a width of 90 feet. Descending a path leading under it, one can fully appreciate its enormous proportions, and its beauty; while from above and close by can be seen the towering and imposing Mount Aconcagua, rising to a height of 23,080 feet.

All along the basin of the River Cuevas are many strong mineral springs, which issue forth from the rock into natural reservoirs, and are rapidly coming into estimation the question of woman's equality with man was at all involved in the incident. Such an interpretation would be very much strained and fanciful, indeed; yet the fact remains that to a woman was this honor given to be the first who saw the risen Redeemer.

Miss Lotta B. White, superintendent of the Butler County Sabbath School Association, of Butler, Pa., writes, relative to the biographical sketch of the late Fanny Crosby which recently appeared in this journal: "You state that her last public appearance was in May, 1911, when she attended a mass meeting in Carnegie Hall, N. Y. I heard her at the International C. E. Convention at Atlantic City in July of that year. She spoke for a few minutes of her great joy in being permitted to be present, and when asked to name her favorite hymns she did so, naming Safe in the Arms of Jesus, Saviour, More than Life to Me, Pass Me Not, etc., and special singers sang them to her delight."

R. M., Decatur, Iowa. "At a recent meeting here it was stated that no man or woman was ever won to Christ except through the efforts of some other person. Is that statement invariably true?" We think not, in the literal sense. Take the case of the sudden conversion of Paul as an illustration. Certainly it could not be said that he was brought to a saving knowledge of Christ through the efforts of any person. Dr. L. J. Birney, in an address some time ago before a religious gathering at Indianapolis, spoke of Dr. Durbin as having laid down the same general proposition. There are doubtless many who come into the light through the reading of the Scriptures and prayer; yet, in a remote and impersonal sense, they may be said to have been influenced, perhaps unconsciously, by the experience and example of others. Hence, if we critically investigate each case of conversion within our knowledge, it will be generally found, except in very rare instances where the connection is untraceable, that they have been led by the influence of others. By way of illustrating the remarkable and far-

Paid by the nation's gold,
And kill a man with every shot
They name them heroes bold.

But when the homes of thousands
Are made a prey of war,
The heroes (?) are applauded
With epaulet and star.

O cruel war! O senseless war!
When will thy carnage cease,
And men and nations understand
Our Saviour's rule of peace?

ATLANTA STIRRED BY A REVIVAL

THE accompanying picture shows the sign which fronts the Chapman-Alexander Tabernacle in Atlanta, Ga. The sign stands on a permanent advertising billboard. With the governor's mansion on the right, and the University Club on the left, the tabernacle specially built for these meetings fronts historic Peachtree street, the best-known business and residential thoroughfare in the South. Peachtree Street is a byword for life, and anything unusual that appears thereon does not escape notice. It was not long before the sign drew considerable comment. After dark the billboard is electrically lit with concealed lights, so that, night or day, the city cannot escape it.

A PICTURE THAT TELLS ITS OWN STORY

"Atlanta for Christ" is the slogan of the campaign, and the letters appear in white on a red background. "II Timothy 2:15" needs no explanation to readers of the Christian Herald, but more than one or two people on the street, not familiar with the Word of God, were even forced by their curiosity to look it up. "Get Right With God," the most striking legend on the board, is in flaming letters, three feet high, and glows out boldly from the white.

On the day not long after the meetings began a citizen in addressing the Ad. Men's Club saw fit to criticize this sign as general, and the phrase "Get Right With God" in particular. "It was just advertising. It was slangy. It was not Scriptural." Such were the objections of this professing Christian, who was evidently no believer in the voice of Paul as given in the latter part of I Cor. 9: 22.

The newspapers published his speech verbatim, and the unexpected result was that in two days the phrase, "Get Right With God," was on everybody's lips, and in greater numbers than ever the people wended their way to the Chapman-Alexander tabernacle, promptly out-taxing its accommodation.

Such is the history of the sign. It is under a "Sign of the Times," for the night after night, behind the billboard, the Gospel is preached and sung to immense audiences. Touched by the ringing of the Gospel hymns under the inspiring leadership of Charles M. Alexander; stirred by the powerful appeals of Dr. Chapman, men and women in increasing numbers every day come to a fuller realization of their need, and are "getting right with God" by accepting his Son as their personal Saviour. Christian people would have called them this year to Aberdeen and to London, but the war temporarily changes the plan of the British committee, and these evangelists after laboring in Lima, Ohio, have just recently closed the campaign in Atlanta, Ga., and then began their work in Charlotte, N. C.

The preparatory work for the Chapman-Alexander Missions is exceedingly thorough. For months before the arrival of the evangelists the cities are districted, and the homes of the Christian people are thrown open for prayer. In Atlanta people from all walks of life have met in great numbers to pray for a great spiritual victory. A religious census is also taken of the city, and every man, woman and child not identified with the church has his name taken, and this is turned over to the minister for whom he expresses a preference, or to the nearest church if no preference is expressed.

In the preparatory meetings the ministers preach along the lines of the coming evangelistic campaign. There is frequently an interchange of pulpits. Not only is the city prepared where the meeting is to be held, but the nearby cities and towns are reached. This thoroughness of work has made the Atlanta movement a most remarkable one. That the Atlanta meeting is a great success is evidenced by the following expressions taken from the estimates made of the revival by some of Atlanta's leading citizens. These are made over their own signature:

"The methods of both Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander are above any kind of criticism, and will prove of lasting benefit to our city."

"We believe that the results of the work will be permanent. Already thousands have been reached, and the meeting is not half over."

"The methods used have not been extreme, and I believe that the results will be lasting. A profound impression has been made upon the city at large."

"You may be sure that there will be no backwash after these meetings close."

It is said that Atlanta is the gateway to the South, and certainly the Atlanta meeting is proving that the South is ripe for a revival.

DAVID AND GOLIATH

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR APRIL 25.
I SAM. 17: 1-54

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"What shall we say to these things? If God be for us, who is against us?" Romans 8: 31.

The court is crowded. Our time has come to be judged. The witnesses have given evidence, one after another; and their direct and unshaken testimony has grown ever darker and more destructive of hope. The last star in our sky is overcast, and the heavy clouds hang close to earth like a canopy of wrath. Conscience has told of the myriad times that her still small voice has been gagged. Secret sins have stood forth in the light, and told of our shame. The mocking tempters, who have lured us to evil thoughts, words, and actions, have offered triumphant evidence of our frequent yielding to their suggestions. The recording angel has been compelled to disclose his observations and notes. What shall we say to these things? Admit them all! Say, "I have gone astray like a lost sheep!" Say, "Have mercy on me, O God, according to thy tender mercies." But, stop! Behold, the Judge steps down from his seat, saying: "Deliver him from going down into the pit. I have found a ransom." What ransom? He gives himself! "He came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and give his life a ransom for many." "He can therefore be just and the justifier of him that believeth." Wherefore, being justified by faith, we have peace with God. God is not against us; and from his presence our accusers steal out, self-condemned.

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

THESE are many references to men of giant stature in the Old Testament. Goliath of Gath is one of the latest mentioned in connection with the kingdom of Israel. If we reckon the cubit as twenty-one inches, then Goliath was over eleven feet in height. But many authorities make the cubit a handbreadth shorter, and in that case he would still be over nine feet in stature. If he was measured from the ground to the top of his armor crest, this height is not incredible. The description of the size and weight of this armor calls for a man of such stature.

Chang, the famous Chinese giant, the tallest man of modern times, without his thick-soled shoes or high hat was 8 feet and 11 inches. Frederick the Great's Scottish giant, whose stature has been authentically recorded, was not quite 8 feet 3 inches. The tallest men in Syria today are certainly under 7 feet.

"The Philistine stood and cried . . . morning and evening." Many of these verses, 8-11, 16, 23, 42-47, in poetic form, employing either rhyme or alliteration, belong to what are called "taunt songs," of which the Bible contains scores of examples. These are the messages shouted across the narrow valley by the Philistines and the Israelites while encamped on opposite sides. This custom is continued to the present day in Syria. Boys from opposite villages, conflicting and warring sects among all classes of population, indulge in rhyming jeers. The war songs dropping into rhyme and fitting popular melodies on European battlefields are a continuation of this very ancient custom.

The sling was a weapon used by Hebrews, Egyptians and Assyrians and by them passed on to the later Greeks. During their palmy days the Romans employed foreign auxiliaries of slingers from Greece, Syria and Africa. The left-handed slingers of Benjamin were famous (Judges 20: 16).

The form of the sling has never changed, being about the same in all ages. In Syria the strap and the two strings are woven of stout woolen yarn, sometimes of horsehair. The strap is called the "hand," in which the pebble is placed. Our home for twelve years was in Zahleh, a village on Lebanon, where every boy was trained to the use of the sling and where every boy seemed to have a scar on his head from some other boy's sling. They were expert enough to kill small birds with pebbles.

The valley of Elah, where the combat took place, now called Wady es Sunt, is easily recognizable in southern Judea among the hills which slope away to the country of the Philistines. David easily made the journey of twelve miles from his home in Bethlehem, almost due west and down the narrow valley to the battlefield. The bed of the brook is still strewn with a bountiful supply of smooth white waterworn pebbles.

A Boy and a Giant

By Arthur H. Howland

THE Philistines were harassing Israel again, as in the days of Samson. They still made raids, plundering property and capturing the people, whom they sold as slaves. Their five leading cities were Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron and Gath. From Gath came the insolent giant Goliath, who for forty days had challenged the army of Israel to send out a champion to meet him in single combat.

It was common in ancient times for hostile armies or nations to decide their contests in this way. Thus Paris offered to fight Menelaus; thus the Horatii and the Curiatii represented their countries in combat. Peloubet and Wells quote Geike as saying, "In the days of Saul, at least, the result of such a duel was regarded as a divine judgment and often saved much blood." It is hardly possible to read this without wishing that some such plan could be devised to bring the war in Europe to a decision. If the kings, or diplomats, or bankers, or merchants who have disputes would come out and fight one another hand to hand, while all would regret the resulting bloodshed, it would seem infinitely more just than that millions of men should be slain to settle the differences of a few dozen.

Here comes the boy David from his father's farm at Bethlehem, bearing a few biscuits and a little threshed and parched wheat or barley for his three brothers serving in Israel's army and encamped in the valley Elah, and ten cheeses as a gift to the one whom we shall call the colonel of their regiment. He was also to bring back word to his father how his brothers were getting along.

Reading the account in the Authorized Version we are startled to come upon a word we see every day in the accounts of Europe's battles: "And he came to the trench as the host was going forth to fight." But trench means, as we see in the American revision, the place of wagons. It was simply the line of wagons used as a rough barricade. David left here what he was carrying, greeted his brothers, saw the approach of the Philistine giant and was ashamed to see his fellow countrymen running away from him.

He hears the big rewards offered to the man who will destroy this arch-enemy. David takes the matter very seriously: "Who is this uncircumcised Philistine," he asks, "that he should defy the armies of the living God?" Eliab scornfully rebukes his unwarranted zeal. But he keeps on asking questions, until his words reach the ears of Saul, who sends for him.

Then came his confident rehearsal of God's past deliverance, the king's consent that he accept the giant's challenge, the effort to fit into an armor

These two women did the same amount of work during the day.

This woman got up at five o'clock started her washing by making a red-hot fire filled the wash-tub and set it on the stove to boil.

Then she hard rubbed the other till her hands got sore and her back ached. The tears and smell of the boiling clothes made her sick.

The regular housework was neglected, because five o'clock in the afternoon found her wringing out the last piece, and after that she a miserable cold supper for the family, which was too tired and cross to eat her self.

But this woman put her clothes to soak after breakfast, in cool or lukewarm water, while she straightened up the house. Then she finished the easy part of the washing—Fels-Naptha had already done the hard part. She didn't have to hard-rub the clothes—the dirt was all ready to roll out with a few easy rubs.

The wash didn't have to be boiled; no need of a hot fire. She got through a little before noon—and had the afternoon to rest and get a nice nourishing supper.

Don't waste time and strength—get Fels-Naptha today and do your housework and washing the easy Fels-Naptha way.

Fels & Co., Philadelphia.

not his, his choice of pebbles from the brook, the scornful boast of the surprised giant, David's brave reliance on the sure shot, backed by the God, the death of the giant and the defeat of the enemy's army. Among pluck! we say; amazing with! A scene and an announcement to the world and all ages to ponder at: "I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied. We like the picture of David leaning toward Goliath; he did not creep forward with hesitating feet. We like the picture of his slaying the giant with the giant's own sword. They that take the sword shall perish with the sword." We like his independence in refusing to be turned back by the indifference or ridicule of his brothers and the rest. Most of all—now do we?—want to be like David attacking our own temptations and our own tasks for God, in assailing the forces that are blocking the progress of Christ's cause.

Not with swords, nor guns, not even with eggs and shots are we to defeat our enemies now. Christ showed us a better way, which Europe, Christian in name, has forgotten. But with the same trust in our hearts that David had, with the same love for God and right, we may go against the forces of hate and unrighteousness and win justice and win victories as David won his.

Trust—and a Sling

By Amos R. Wells

GOLIATH has always been a symbol of gigantic evils. What a Goliath is war! This accursed giant has so wantonly wasting money directly at the rate of at least six billion dollars a year, and indirectly no one is able to heart to guess how much. He takes a toll of human life by the millions and of human happiness by the hundred million. He has the entire world in his grip, and is squeezing out of it the prosperity and joy of many people to come. Oh for a David to slay this Goliath!

But Goliath was only one of a family of giants. What a Goliath is the world. Its yearly waste of money, and resources and life is equal to that of the war giant at his worst, and he continued now for centuries. Besides, he slays the soul, while the war giant in most cases slays only the body. Oh for a David against this Goliath, and against the Goliaths of unbelief, of infidelity, of greed, of lag and of pride! Verily the hillside giants are not yet extinct.

The arrogance of all these giants shines perfectly that of the giant of Goliath. Pride is a mark of littleness, a mark of an organization of men, and humility always marks greatness. And George Washington, "Speak not when others speak, sit not when they stand, walk not when others stop." One of the greatest men of modern science was Professor Roentgen, the discoverer of the x-ray. An international congress was called to celebrate the tenth anniversary of this marvelous discovery, which has done so much for mankind and is to do so much more. Roentgen was on the program, but so shrank from facing the throng of admirers that he could not attend, and merely sent his acknowledgments by telegraph. Contrast that with the swaggering parade of the Goliaths!

The fear that Goliath inspired was born of ignorance, as most fear is. The Israelites did not know what a big bubble he was and how easily pricked. When Garland was attorney-general of the United States his little old-fashioned mother kept house for him in Washington. It was well known in the city that the sweet little lady was not afraid of anybody. She explained it by saying, "My dear, at my age there are no great men." Wisdom and experience teach us what to fear and what not to fear.

Before David faced Goliath he had to face the ridicule of his brothers, and that was harder. Once in Athens a man dropped a loaf of bread and was afraid to pick it up again for fear some one might make fun of him. To teach him a lesson Diogenes tied a cord around the neck of a bottle and dragged it through Athens. "Many people will laugh at you," said a man to the philosopher. "But I am not laughed down," Diogenes replied. That is the stuff of which David was made, and all other heroes.

It was well for David that he did not try to fight wearing Saul's heavy armor. He was sorely tempted thus to compliment the king, just as we moderns are sorely tempted to follow the crowd, to imitate the great, to be somebody else rather than our own probably inferior selves. John Stuart Mill put the matter strongly when he said, "A want of individuality is the most dangerous sign in modern civilization." It is this that perpetuates evils. It is this that prevents progress. We wear the archaic armor of our ancestors and do not dare like David to find our own weapons and adapt ourselves to our own times.

The heart of this splendid story is not the killing of Goliath; it comes earlier, in David's calm expression of trust in Jehovah. A man watched a young mother in a railway car. Suddenly she lifted her baby from the seat beside her, put the child's little arms around her neck and held her close. The man wondered at this, but the action was soon explained as the train shot into a dark and roaring tunnel. The little one was not in the least frightened by the experience, but would have been if her mother's arms had not been around her. David always felt himself supported by "the everlasting arms," and has shown us the way into the same trust.

Well, Goliath fell, tumbled unexpectedly into the dust by a pebble from an insignificant sling. It was like that one and only capture of the old castle in Edinburgh, which was left undefended on one side because its defenders thought the rock there too steep for climbing. But the foe did climb there, and the castle fell as Goliath fell. Verily, "the Christian is one who attempts impossibilities."

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

Conducted by Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

AS OUR Sunday school and church have decided to adopt the combination morning service, would consider it a great favor if you could give us your opinion as to whether it is best to dismiss the primary department or have it remain for the church service. Can you direct us to where we can secure a form of service, put us in touch with some church using the combination service where we can secure such information?

Any churches are now using the combination church and Sunday school service. The Year of Sunday Schools, 1018 Wabash Avenue, Chicago, will, upon application, furnish several pamphlets which give the successful experience of churches with this service. Many pastors and superintendents are inquiring as to the practical working out of the plan. I am giving the order of service with two churches that have successfully employed this plan: (1) Organizational. (2) Hymn. (3) Prayer. (4) Pastor's Doxology. (5) Scripture lesson. (6) Song and special music by choir. (7) No. (8) Sermon. (9) Brief prayer. (10)

Hymn. (11) Bible study. (12) Secretary's report. (13) Hymn. (14) Benediction.

The other order of service begins at 10 and closes at 11.55.

At 10 o'clock the Beginners' and Primary classes take up their regular Sunday school work in the church parlors, and come into the audience room for public worship at 11 o'clock. At 10 o'clock the Intermediate and Adult classes assemble in the audience room and the church choir takes its place. (1) Organ voluntary. (2) Hymn from Sunday School Hymnal. (3) Apostles' Creed. (4) Prayer by pastor, closing with Lord's Prayer. (5) Hymn from Sunday School Hymnal. (6) Sunday school lesson read responsively by superintendent and school. (7) Class study of Sunday school lesson (thirty minutes). (8) Pastor's exposition of Sunday school lesson (ten minutes).

At 11 o'clock the entire school is seated in the audience room.

(1) Report of Sunday school secretaries. (2) Hymn from Sunday School Hymnal. (3) Church

ARGO

Motorvique

4-cylinder, shaft drive

$295

f.o.b. factory
Top, windshield, headlights and generator attached, $29 extra

HERE'S efficient, comfortable motor-transportation at a first cost so low and an up-keep so economical that owners say it's "cheaper than carfare."

The Argo is not a freak or an untried experiment. It is an easy-riding, good-looking car of sound mechanical design, sponsored by some of the best-known and most successful men in the industry.

The Argo embodies the best European engineering ideas—and the light car has reached its highest success abroad. American manufacturing skill in quantity production at low cost has done the rest.

Benjamin Briscoe and his associates have been working on the Argo for years. They have tried it over all kinds of roads and under all traveling conditions. Every detail of construction, every item of material, has been subjected to the most exhaustive tests.

For pleasure and for business—for the town dweller or the farmer—for the professional man, the business man or the high-school student—the Argo offers a greater return than any other investment of a similar amount you could make.

See the Car, or

PLACATING MARY PETER

"Is—it—good—Jim?" She purred over his baptismal.

"Hm, hm."

Mary curbed her desire to throw the lamp at him and went on putting patches on his shirt. Jim held the Courier on his knee and blinked at the fire. The clock curfewed nine.

"Wall, I guess et's time to go to roost," said he, stretching out comfortably in the asthmatic rocker.

Half an hour passed while she conjured dark plots to get rid of him. Ready to scream with impatience, she uttered a mild, "Well, I guess et's time to go to bed!" and settled back uncomfortably in her chair.

"Ya—up," said Jim. But he did not move.

Nine forty-five!

"Well, I declare it'll be mornin' and time to milk 'fore we git to bed!" Mary rose and tossed her sewing into the basket.

She placed the lamp in the geometrical center of the table. She traversed the circumferences of several circles around Jim, straightening the machine cover which was straight, wound the clock which had been Jim's exclusive job for twenty years, gave the window plants a cold shower in opposition to her set rule of watering them "fore the sun struck 'em"; dusted the spotless clock shelf and straightened the rug before the fireplace, which had never been out of alignment with the point where the red painted boards joined the undecked woodwork underneath.

Then she sat on the perilous edge of a chair and teetered, glaring at the masculine bulk spread over two chairs, who any other night "would 'a' been in bed at seven a'clock."

The paper fell to the floor as he performed a St. Bernard stretch. As he started to bed he stumbled through the outspread sheets of the Courier. The law-and-order instinct which Mary's perpetual immaculateness had drilled in him asserted itself. He folded the paper in its proper creases and threw it into the fireplace. The flames woke and Mary's oratory was in ashes.

Choked, speechless, Mary trailed wearily up the stairs behind him to bed.

At nine o'clock the next morning she went to Mrs. Green's to borrow the paper. That individual was shiny-faced and red from a tussle with a batch of doughnuts.

"Yes, I hed the paper, but I started the kitchen fire with et this mornin'. You could jes' as well 'a' had et. Yer speech wuz wonderful elevatin', Mis' Peters."

Into the Dorchester gate walked Mary.

"The paper? If you'd come five minutes earlier—sent et to town by Jerry—to Sister Clary. Wanted her to see your speech."

Mrs. Blackburn was next.

"Our paper ain't come. Tim was fumin' round here las' night, wantin' to know where the paper wuz. Wuz you in a hurry?"

Mary proved that she was by the speed with which she left the Blackburn homestead behind her. She felt comfortable that everyone praised her speech, but it wasn't satisfying. You can look at a dish of luscious peaches and get a certain amount of pleasure in visualization, but there is nothing like a bite out of each for pure satisfaction.

Mary watched Mrs. Burke peel turnips awhile before she broached her errand.

"We don't take the paper. Our subscription run out in July. They sent us a bill last week, and it made John so mad that they'd send a stingy bill for six months he wouldn't pay 'em, and ordered 'em to stop the paper. I heard you made a fine speech at the temperance meetin'."

"Yes," agreed Mary absently. Then she went out into the sunshine and looked up and down the street. Mrs.

Caldwell's household was spread miscuously about the yard with the owner buried under a mattress.

"Course I'd been glad to see you the Courier, but I wuz clear 'bout mornin', and put et on the cellar shelf."

A feverish Mary walked to the large to get—soap and ginger eyes tricked her into looking at a sign. In battered, time-worn letter it was—Titusville Courier. Mary let pride went down in a heap. She lie and passed under the sign.

If Mr. Wilkins, owner, editor, advertising manager, star and cub reporter was startled to see his openly enemy he gave no sign.

"Good mornin', Mr. Wilkin'!" she said faintly; "I want to git me of this week's papers."

"All right, Mrs. Peters; how many?" "Two or three is all I need—ut I'd like one besides."

He passed between the typewriters to a pile of papers, the lower section chocolate brown with two years' dust the upper showing in graduated degrees that the accumulating process was still going on.

Let's see; that would be Friday, December 8, wouldn't it? Here's Friday, December—no, that's December first, Friday, November—no, we don't want that. December 8. H'm, that's sunny. Hey, Kane!" said he, piercing the inmost recesses of the pre-room with a heavy voice, "where's the December 8 copies?"

"Ain't they none there? All one, I guess."

Mary crumpled. "Are you sure Kane?" shouted the editor, poking helplessly through some antecedent issues.

"Mr. Wilkins," stammered Mary, "I've been bearin a grudge ag' you sence you wrote I wuz a 'baki' visitor to Sulphur Springs. Cuss et ain't Christian like and I ow up to wuz in the wrong. I want to thank you fer printin' my article. Can't seem to get a paper, but folks com-mentin' on et, so I guess et n't 'a' been all right."

It was lunch time. Mary's stomach was empty. But her head and heart were too full for appetite. She eyed the Colonial parsonage across the street with interest other than the usual homage; for hope has perpetual motion no matter how dull and out it is. But she waited awhile at the drug store and ate peppermint drops until she figured Rev. Mr. Cochran's wife would have the table pared and wouldn't have to invite her to eat. The rest brought her that temporary equipment of strength often needed for the last spurt at anything.

She turned the bell handle. "Yes, we have the paper," said Mr. Cochran. "I want to congratulate you have got the remarkable impetus you have got to the morals of the community through your splendid talk to our ladies."

"Thanks, Brother Cochran," low it took some time to git et to the munity any good."

Mr. Cochran turned the paper out side in, inside out and upside down first patiently, then frantically. Then he did it again.

"How stupid! The first pages not here."

He brought from the library a piece of paper that looked as if some one had been trying to make it into a comb.

"I believe the baby has tried to eat it up," laughed he.

It was the indissoluble, indisputable truth that the Cochran family had left no proof of Mrs. Peters' brilliancy.

She wended her stricken way to Amanda Evans Hawkins's. The curl of smoke from the chimney, the fraternal sign of hospitality to the country wayfarer, did not curl. The kitchen curtains were lowered, a fallible sign in rural districts that no one is at home.

Mary tramped wearily to the street and came face to face with Rura Free.

ALABASTINE CO. 339 Grandville Rd. Grand Rapids, Mich.

Every Mail Box No. 187 of Route 2 protruding invitingly was a Titusville Courier. She knew it was the Courier. No other paper had such variegated wrappings and no editor had ever duplicated the heterogeneous tie. Nobody was at home and—temptation mounted into her mind. She extended her fingers reverently. Then she put her hand behind her, still a honest citizen of the town.

The idea, Mary Peters! would you never neighbor's mail box—and after you've made a moral temprance speech, too?"

She left a note for Amanda to save the paper. Mary next took the short-cut out Spencer Road. The Spencer house gave magnificent grace to a hill. Mary was scared of the grand house as awed by its mistress, but a mission soon brings its own equipment of bravery. She shut her teeth with the o time click that always upset Jim, as a fared up the veranda.

Mrs. Spencer, in a city-made tea gown and lace cap, flustered with ribbons, drawled, "What a pleasure to see you, Mrs. Peters!" with inflections that suggest that pleasure is a perfect bore.

"Thanks!" came meekly from the depths of upholstery. "I come to see you hed this week's paper. I'd love toorry et ef yer through with et."

"Don't you take the paper?" came in staccato icicles from Mrs. Spencer, who having subscribed and paid in advance for five years was in a position to marvel.

Yes, but Jim burnt et up 'fore I could read et."

Hired men are so careless!" gracefully enunciated Mrs. Spencer.

Oh, 'scuse me, Mis' Spencer, Jim aint the hired man; he's my old man."

Oh—you—mean—your—husband."

Oh, Chase," called Mrs. Spencer, who was in Newport training. She languidly directed Chase to give Mary the paper.

Mary left with a gay heart. She reached home at four, tossed her best bonnet on the table and opened the paper.

She blinked. Then she stared tongue-tied and muscle-locked. The pre was there, but the temperance story had been cut out and dull advertising showed through the desecrated space. Mary gazed at the scenery for five minutes without seeing it, then she put the teakettle on with such vehemence that it bounced.

Mrs. Green entered. "I thought I started the fire with the paper, Mary, but I found et in the woodbox. Kind oolirly, but mebbe you kin read et. Al Mis' Dorchester wrote her sister to send their paper back."

Mary's spirits sang gaily as she bent over the potato bin. Exit Mrs. Green; enter Mrs. Blackburn.

Our paper come today, and Tim rel et. They put a extry copy in, an' you kin hev both."

Mary swathed her in gratitude. The clock number three heralded Mrs. B. Ke.

Corried Mis' Ellis's paper. She's be lendin' et to us sence we stopped out."

Mary was in superlative transports. Three potatoes peeled. Mrs. Caldwell panted in.

Mary, I got to thinkin' after you le I could jes' as well went down ceir and took that paper off'n the shelf. I never thought I could put ather on. I did that now."

As Jim came from the barn a boy sprinkling with brass and other accoutrements of livery passed majestically in the Peters gate and knocked fobodingly on the door.

The grand gilt-edged envelope flustered Mary into opening it with the peeing knife.

My esteemed Mrs. Peters: It occurred to me after you left that perhaps you wanted to see your talk before the temperance society. I had my maid clip it to send away. The clipping is enclosed. MRS. JOHN BURLEIGH-FITZGERALD SPENCER."

The lady with the hyphenated cognomen did not add that she had designated the speech a sample of backwoods oratory.

Mary bowed and scraped to the "livery man." He went forth with his importance and she lunged into a chair and mopped her brow with its new "tidy" as Jim peeked in to see if the company had gone.

"Everybody's sendin' me the paper with my speech," she said apologetically.

"Are you keepin' 'em?"

Mary was submerged in arithmetic.

"Seven papers—one for the Cranes, one for Anne—one for—I'll put some in the depot readin' rack where the towerists will read 'em."

The door received a thunderous thud—the cause, Jake the village grocery boy, bent and intent with a load.

"I tole Mr. Cochran I wuz comin' by here, and he axed me to bring them papers. He had fifty extra papers run off, and he give you forty of 'em."

Mary chuckled hysterically as she laid the papers on the floor and turned to find another boy with a bulky package.

"Mis' Peters, Mr. Wilkins found these papers after you hed went. They wuz back by the press, and we didn't know we hed 'em. Mr. Wilkins says fer you to take the whole twenty-five of 'em with his compliments."

The papers took a toboggan slide across the floor.

"Pears like I want my supper," said Jim, and he settled ponderously into the wooden chair and dipped a generous hodgepodge of salt pork and boiled potatoes.

Mary fussed among the papers like Ophelia waving the Rosemary in "Hamlet." She compared the printed product with the thirty-four sheets of her writing tablet, and word by word they were identical. She opened her scrap book to anchor one of the clippings.

Staring at the page she stood with digits outstretched like fan stays. Then she looked questioning at Jim.

"When did you paste that clippin' in there?"

"This mornin'. Thought mebbe you'd like to keep et."

"This mornin'?" Wher'd you git et? Why, I tramped—" She swallowed the remainder of the sentence.

"Tore et out the paper las' night while you wuz polishin' the clock shelf and turnin' the house upsid' down in general."

For half a minute Mary's jaw was locked with a round O that never materialized in sound. She opened the door in answer to another knock. It was Joe Bilkins, who ran the saloon that stood opposite the Methodist church where she had given her lecture—the only "wet" district in the township. He held in his hand a clipping.

Mary remembered the sentence in it that had caused him to come. "Joe Bilkins is selling the devil's fiery liquor, tempting our young men to their downfall. Their ruin is on his guilty hands. Brothers and sisters, we must wipe out this terrible disgrace from Titusville."

He waved the paper before her, while the blood mounted in his face and his veins stood out like the stamping on embroidery paper. She bristled with her temperance tactics.

"Well?" Antagonism oozed out of every letter.

He fumbled the paper and mixed it earnestly with his hat.

"Mis' Peters, I want to say—I've come to say—you said I'm runnin' to ruin the young men—and I reckon I hev to live—but I want to say—I'm goin' to close the saloon and go to farmin' vegetables. Won't even raise apples for fear they git into cider. They're goin' to turn my place into a—a—I guess they said 'civil center.'"

He held out his hand. "And here is five dollars to give to the missionaries in South Africky or Californy." Then he bolted and strode down the path mopping his forehead and the back of his neck. He looked around when he got to the gate. Mary had just strength enough left to wave him a benediction. Then tenderly, reverently, she placed one of the clippings in the family Bible.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

I ASKED for prayer through your league for the conversion of my husband. He gave his heart to God the first day of February, 1915." This happy news comes from A Reader in Maine. Mrs. C. L. G. writes from Springfield, La.: "I wrote some weeks ago requesting prayer. I wish to acknowledge the blessing of God in answering. I have found that blessed peace at last." Mrs. J. M. B. writes: "I want to acknowledge answer to prayer for my nephew. He is a youth sixteen years old, and I cannot be thankful enough that he has been brought to Christ. He 'hit the trail' at one of the Sunday meetings and is now working every night at a union revival meeting being held in our church, and has already brought some of his companions to the Saviour." A "Wife and Mother" writes: "I asked the Prayer League to pray that the little band of members of the Minaville M. E. Church be blessed and a deep work of grace wrought in the hearts of the people. The prayer has been answered, praise his holy name! We have a revival going on now." Mrs. J. A. Hardy, "Mother" of the Prayer League, writes that her prayers are being still more definitely and fully answered.

Acknowledgments of answers to prayers have also been received from:

Reader, Lestershire, N. Y.; Rev. D. H. S., Ionia, Mich.; J. R. B., Asheville, N. C.; Mrs. A. K., Port Byron, N. Y.; Mrs. A. J. P., Middleport, N. Y.; Mrs. E. A. R., Wellsville, N. Y.; S. SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

notices and church collection. (4) Anthem. (5) Sermon. (6) Hymn from Sunday School Hymnal. (7) Benediction at 11.55. After a thorough test this order was made the permanent order of worship. The attendance of adults at Sunday school service has increased 300 per cent, and the entire Sunday school attendance has increased 150 per cent. It has increased the attendance of children upon public worship 500 per cent. The pastor has had a message for his own young people. The Sunday school service has become "the Bible teaching service of the church." There is no dismissal between services. It has made the Sunday school and church one.

Q. Can you suggest name of the book on Bible questions referred to in previous Round Table, and cost?—Mrs. O. A. G.

A. This book is A Supplemental Bible Question Course, by John B. Smith, published by the Sunday School Times Company, Philadelphia, Pa. Price, 50 cents. It is a manual of Bible facts, places, persons, etc. This book may be used for a platform drill by the superintendent or by the teacher in the class or in a question contest for a class social occasion.

Q. Can you give me any good helps on the Sunday school lessons? I get the Sunday School Quarterly, but it don't explain the lesson I wish it would. What good commentaries is there and how much would it cost?—Mrs. B. McW.

A. Every teacher should, if possible, have some good lesson help in addition to the one quarterly; such helps as Peloubet's ($1.00); Tarbell's Guide ($1.15); Practical Commentary by Arnold (55 cents). Each teacher will need to select the illustrations and points suitable for the class, gather the homely stories of daily life that will make the lesson real, and then, through prayer, a clear vision of Christ and a deeper love for the scholar, give to all of the material a living value.

Cordial Appreciation

A Spic and Span House

A discolored floor, or a few scars on mop board or furniture may take away your pleasure in a room.

Get a can of

and fix that little job up yourself.

It is a most marvellous finish for any woodwork. It stains and varnishes with one sweep of the brush, never leaves laps, streaks, or brush marks, and makes a surface almost as hard and transparent as glass. It brings out the grain and beauty of the wood and needs only your dry mop to remove the dust.

For an old floor, you do not need to remove the present surface if you use Campbell's Varnish Stain Graining Process, which is easy, simple and effective.

13 COLORS

natural wood, light oak, dark oak, walnut, cherry, mahogany, green, rosewood, white enamel, flat black, gloss black, piazza green and piazza red. Also ground color and surfacer for graining.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

The Bible the World's Supreme Book

Christian Endeavor Topic for April 25. Deut. 6: 1-9

THE Bible is the world's supreme book because it gets us acquainted with God. It meets our deepest need and brings us our highest gains. In the Bible we read of men with like passions as ourselves who knew God intimately. They talked with him. They asked him to do things for them, they walked with him by day and thought of him at night. We cannot read of God's kindness to these men and his friendship with them without knowing very positively that he wants to do the same things for us which he did for them. In the New Testament we see Jesus. We see the kind of a man he was and the kind of things he did, and we are convinced that he has not changed in any manner or in any degree. He longs to save and bless and help us now as he longed to save and bless and help the people who knew him long ago.

The Bible tells us how to solve our problems, how to bear our burdens, how to do our work, how to get ready for the next world. It shows us our sin and our need of God, and gives us the picture of the cross of Calvary, by which we find our way into the divine Presence and gain forgiveness and spiritual power. It shows us our true calling and place and mission in life, which is to lead others to the Christ of the Bible, to lead them to adopt his plan of life, to share in his joys, to gain the life that has no end.

Missionary Practice Through the Use of Tracts

B. Y. P. U. Topic for April 25. Eccles. 11: 1-6 (Conquest meeting)

MORE than fifty-nine million tracts have been distributed by the American Baptist Publication Society since 1840. During the missionary year, 1913-14, representatives of the society distributed 1,277,358 tracts.

For some reason or other American Christians seem to have been getting the idea that the use of tracts is obsolete. But people are more interested in reading than ever. If tracts are well written and carefully published they will be read as in former years. Our lesson deals particularly with the use of tracts on the mission field. In lands of more primitive civilization the people are greatly impressed by the printed word. In our home mission work the tract is particularly useful. Hundreds of copies are distributed to the immigrants at Ellis Island, printed in the language of their homeland. The tract once read is handed on to some one else. Even if it is thrown away some one else will see the words and through them be made to hear the call of the Holy Spirit.

What the League is Doing in India

Epworth League Lesson for April 25. James 1: 27; 1 Cor. 1: 26-31

READ the editorial in last week's Christian Herald, "India's Mass Movement Christward." The reports from that land are more wonderful than from any other field. There are on the files of the missionaries a list of 160,000 names, people still unbaptized, who have signified their desire to be taught to be Christians. There were, two years ago, 63,685 Methodist young people in India. Twenty-three thousand of these were members of the league. Thirty-five thousand Methodist converts were baptized during 1913, many of them young people, so the league's numbers have been reinforced. League literature is published in India in ten languages. The Christian Herald will have more to say about India's great Christward impulse. Write to the Board of Foreign Missions at 150 Fifth Avenue, New York City, for the pamphlet, "A Challenge—Shall We Meet It?"

FOR this Gold Medal represents the Grand Prix of the jury of the International Congress of Medicine—the world's greatest medical gathering. Convening once in four years, the Congress assembles the foremost physicians of every country of the globe, and its deliberations bear the stamp of final authority. So when under the auspices of such a tribunal, to Sanatogen alone among the many foods and tonics exhibited is awarded the Grand Prix—there can be no question of Sanatogen's standing as the best and most dependable food tonic.

More than 21,000 physicians have already signified in writing their personal faith in Sanatogen. But this award symbolizes the world-wide, professional recognition of Sanatogen as the one rational FOOD-tonic that feeds and rebuilds impoverished cell and tissue, helping digestion and recalling the strength and vigor of youth.

Sanatogen is sold by druggists everywhere in 3 sizes, from $1.00 up.

CAN YOU ANSWER? These Bible Questions!

Has a man two natures?
Is misfortune a judgment of God?
Is it right to ask for definite blessings?
Is being tempted a sin?
Is trouble sent as a punishment?
Can one be saved without knowing it?
Is wealth an evil or a blessing?
Is confession a Christian duty?
Does God send disease?
Is falsehood ever justifiable?
Can the church heal by faith today?

Should a Christian marry a non-Christian?
What is the "unpardonable sin"?
Is sinlessness possible?
What was the "gift of tongues"?
Did Christ sing any hymns?
What was Jesus' first sermon?
Could Jesus sin?
Was the Ascension in human form?
What language did Christ use on earth?
What does "making friends of Mammon" mean?
What is the "new birth"?

The answers to these and over five hundred other equally important Bible questions are contained in this remarkable volume. Can you afford to be without it?

THIS book is the result of research covering a period of twenty-four years. Its theology is thoroughly sound, being along the lines followed by the ablest living orthodox expositors. For twenty-four years, the Christian Herald has been conducting a chair in Biblical questions. Thousands of intelligent inquiries, addressed to this chair, have covered practically every phase of Christian living and Biblical difficulty. These answers have helped myriads over hard places.

This book is a unique addition to Biblical literature. It will be found a handbook that the user will greatly value and love. We believe this book may become one of the most used of all Bible helps. Published in attractive and durable style.

A UNIQUE MEMORIAL

THE friends of Richard Watson Gilder are erecting a monument to his memory, peculiarly appropriate, and also peculiarly interesting as an illustration of the possibilities of combining the sentimental and the practical.

In his writings, as well as in his editorial work—Mr. Gilder was editor of the Century Magazine when he died in 1909—this gifted American gave expression to the same humanitarian impulse which drew his interest to tenement house reform work in New York City and to the efforts of the Kindergarten Association to increase the chances of boys and girls for useful and happy lives.

To perpetuate the memory of a man who worked so continuously for the public good, his friends have sought to solve one of the hardest of our social problems, that of acceptable and ready help to families suddenly left without means by the death of their bread-winner. This class of respectable people suffer more keenly, perhaps, than any other when face to face with destitution. They are not protected by insurance, nor have they been able to accumulate savings. Statistics show that a large percentage of such households, for one reason and another, need a very practical form of assistance through the first year of their bereavement.

To meet the needs of this class a special form of life insurance has been devised, and has received the approval of the Insurance Department of the State of New York so that it can be issued by the regular insurance companies. It is called "The Gilder Weekly Income Policy Plan," and is not sold through paid agents, but can be obtained from life insurance companies only by direct application at the company's home office or branch offices. The cost is low and premiums may be paid annually, semi-annually or quarterly. The Gilder Weekly Income Policy provides for the payment of seventy-five dollars at death, to cover the funeral expenses, and thereafter a weekly income to the family of from ten up to seventeen dollars for fifty-two weeks. The terms of the contract are such that these payments cannot be diverted from the family of the insured.

THE Gilder Policy Association, which is trying to have all the regular life insurance companies issue the Gilder weekly income policy for the benefit of families compelled to live on small weekly earnings, is incorporated solely to promote this special form of welfare work in memory of Richard Watson Gilder, and no officer or member of the association can derive any profit or remuneration from the enterprise. The association believes that employers can do their employees a lasting service by informing them of this special plan. A descriptive literature and folders for distribution, with display posters, are supplied upon request, and there is nothing to prevent any employer, or for that matter, any wage-earner, from getting the fullest light upon this interesting memorial movement. The association is at 103 East Sixteenth Street, New York, and Mr. R. G. Cholmeley-Jones is the president. We understand that insurance companies may also be asked to supply information upon this special form of policy.

It seems to be a beautiful way in which to erect a permanent memorial to a good man. As we understand it, there is no possible conflict between this new departure in life insurance and existing offers by the companies themselves. The elimination of paid agents makes for the lowering of the cost, and as practically an entirely new clientele will respond to the proposal, no one, apparently, is unfavorably affected in a business sense, while multitudes may be vastly benefited and on a business and not a charitable basis, so far as the companies issuing the policy are concerned.

Old Ways Merely Quieted The Corn The New Way Ends It

Some folks still cling to liquids to inefficient plasters, or to mere paring corns.

They wrong themselves.

Their own friends keep free from corns by using Blue-jay plasters.

They apply one in a jiffy, then forget the corn. In 48 hours without pain or soreness, the entire corn comes out.

A famous chemist found this way which makes corns out-of-date. One can't prevent them easily, but to keep them is folly.

An Everyday Home Helper

When a bit of domestic machinery, like a food chopper or an ice cream freezer, needs oiling, use 3-in-One. When the sewing machine runs hard because its springs are dry and gummy with inferior oil and dirt, use 3-in-One.

When furniture is dim and smoky because of long use in close rooms, clean and polish with 3-in-One.

When time comes for sweeping and dusting, use a clean sanitary "dustless duster" made with a cheese cloth and a few drops of 3-in-One.

3-in-One oil is an "everyday home help." From cellar to garret, from front door to back, there is hardly a spot where it isn't useful. It lubricates. It cleans and polishes. It prevents rust. A consistent and persistent use of 3-in-One makes housekeeping easier.

How Prohibition Works in Russia

A NEW light on the temperance situation in Russia is supplied in a letter from the American consulate general in Moscow, Russia, dated February 2, 1915, just received by Mr. A. H. Woodson of the National Model License League, Louisville, Ky. The letter says:

"In response to your inquiry of January 7, requesting exact information in regard to the Russian ukase prohibiting the use of liquors other than vodka in Russia, I beg to state that in the strict sense of the word the Crown has not proclaimed such an edict. At the beginning of the war, the government expressed a desirability for the discontinuance of the sale of all intoxicants throughout the empire, but the issuance of regulations for the sale of drinks were left to the local institutions of self-government.

"The city of Moscow was the first to prohibit the sale of intoxicating drinks, including light wines and beer, but only the vodka shops were closed for the first three months of the war, it being possible to purchase, either at the beer saloons or wine shops, all grades of beer and wine. Vodka was also sold at that time in the higher class restaurants in Moscow, and in fact throughout Russia in the same places. Later, however, all wine stores and beer saloons were closed and the sale of any kinds of intoxicants absolutely forbidden for the time being; no limit being set for the opening of these institutions. Petrograd followed Moscow's example, and so did most of the other cities, boroughs and villages, so that it may be assumed that the sale of intoxicants is forbidden in perhaps 90 per cent. of all cities and towns in the empire.

"In the city of Moscow, these regulations are outwardly being strictly enforced; a heavy fine being exacted from all persons infringing the rules. Wine may only be obtained on a prescription signed by a doctor, the exact amount being named, and the prescription good for only one time, but this office is informed that in all the restaurants drinks may be obtained. It is stated, furthermore, that private houses have sufficient supplies to last during the war.

"At the present moment there is a movement in favor of the authorization to sell light wines and beer; this question will be placed before the legislative institutions upon which will depend the passing of a law regulating the sale of liquors.

"Practically all the breweries in Russia are temporarily closed, but according to a statement of the manager of one of the largest in Moscow they expect to open in the spring, as they anticipate a favorable ruling on the part of the government authorities with regard to the sale of beer. The wine merchants are equally hopeful, but no one is in a position to state accurately what the disposition of the government will be as to the continuance of the general sale throughout the country of vodka. There is a pretty decided opinion on the part of the thinking classes that the bottle houses in the villages and rural districts should be cut down, at least, and perhaps eliminated, and that the number in the larger cities should be fewer. This question is problematical, and no decision will be reached until the cessation of hostilities.

"The government's loss on account of the closing of the vodka shops is more than $1,000,000 per day.

"JOHN N. SNODGRASS."

THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER

Copyright, 1914, by ELEANOR H. PORTER. All rights reserved, including the right to translate into all foreign languages.

IT WAS raining again when Pollyanna got up the next morning, and a northeast wind was still whistling down the chimney. Pollyanna at the window drew an involuntary sigh; but almost at once her face changed.

"Oh, well, I'm glad—" She clapped her hands to her lips. "Dear me," she chuckled softly, her eyes dancing, "I shall forget—I know I shall; and that'll spoil it all! I must just remember not to be glad for anything—not anything today."

Pollyanna did not make corn muffins that morning. She started the breakfast, then went to her aunt's room.

Mrs. Chilton was still in bed.

"I see it rains, as usual," she observed, by way of greeting.

"Yes, it's horrid—perfectly horrid," scolded Pollyanna. "It's rained 'most every day this week, too. I hate such weather."

Aunt Polly turned with a faint surprise in her eyes; but Pollyanna was looking the other way.

"Are you going to get up now?" she asked a little wearily.

"Why, y-yes," murmured Aunt Polly, still with that faint surprise in her eyes. "What's the matter, Pollyanna? Are you especially tired?"

"Yes, I am tired this morning. I didn't sleep well, either. I hate not to sleep. Things always plague so in the night, when you wake up."

"I guess I know that," fretted Aunt Polly. "I didn't sleep a wink after two o'clock myself. And there's that roof! How are we going to have it fixed, pray, if it never stops raining? Have you been up to empty the pans?"

"Oh, yes—and took up some more. There's a new leak now, farther over."

"A new one! Why, it'll all be leaking yet!"

Pollyanna opened her lips. She had almost said, "Well, we can be glad to have it fixed all at once, then," when suddenly she remembered, and substituted, in a tired voice:

"Very likely it will, auntie. It looks like it now, fast enough. Anyway, it's made fuss enough for a whole roof already, and I'm sick of it!" With which statement, Pollyanna, her face carefully averted, turned and trailed listlessly out of the room.

"It's so funny and so—so hard, I'm afraid I'm making a mess of it," she whispered to herself anxiously, as she hurried downstairs to the kitchen.

Behind her, Aunt Polly, in the bedroom, gazed after her with eyes that were again faintly puzzled.

Aunt Polly had occasion a good many times before six o'clock that night to gaze at Pollyanna with surprised and questioning eyes. Nothing was right with Pollyanna. The fire would not burn, the wind blew one particular blind loose three times, and still a third leak was found in the roof. The mail had brought to Pollyanna a letter that made her cry (though no amount of questioning on Aunt Polly's part would persuade her to tell why). Even the dinner went wrong, and innumerable things happened in the afternoon to call out fretful, discouraged remarks.

Not until the day was more than half gone did a look of shrewd suspicion suddenly fight for supremacy with the puzzled questioning in Aunt Polly's eyes. If Pollyanna saw this she made no sign. Certainly there was no abatement in her fretfulness and discontent. Long before six o'clock, however, the suspicion in Aunt Polly's eyes became conviction, and drove to ignominious defeat the puzzled questioning. But, curiously enough, then, a new look came to take its place, a look that was actually a twinkle of amusement.

At last, after a particularly doleful complaint on Pollyanna's part, Aunt Polly threw up her hands with gesture of half-laughing despair.

"That'll do, that'll do, child. I'll give up. I'll confess myself beaten at my own game. You can be—glad, that, if you like," she finished with a grim smile.

"I know, auntie, but you said—" began Pollyanna demurely.

"Yes, yes, but I never will say," interrupted Aunt Polly, with emphasis. "Mercy, what a day it has been! I never want to live through another like it." She hesitated, shed a little, then went on with contented difficulty: "Furthermore, I—I want you to know that—that I understand I haven't played the game myself—very well, lately; but, after that I'm going to—to try. Where's my and-kerchief?" she finished sharply, fumbling in the folds of her dress.

Pollyanna sprang to her feet and crossed instantly to her aunt's side.

"Oh, but, Aunt Polly, I didn't mean—It was just a—a joke," she quivered in quick distress. "I never thought of your taking it that way."

"Of course you didn't," snapped Aunt Polly, with all the asperity of a stern, repressed woman, who through scenes and sentiment, and who is mortally afraid she will show that her heart has been touched. "Do you suppose I know you didn't mean that way? Do you think if I thought you had been trying to teach me a lesson that I'd—I'd—" But Pollyanna's strong young arms had her in close embrace and she could not find the sentence.

CHAPTER XXVII

JIMMY AND JAMIE

POLLYANNA was not the only one that was finding that winter a hard one. In Boston Jimmy and Jamie, in spite of his strenuous efforts to occupy his time and thoughts, was discovering that nothing quite raised from his vision a certain pair of laughing blue eyes, and nothing quite obliterated from his memory a certain well-loved merry voice.

Jimmy told himself that if it were not for Mrs. Carew, and the fact that he could be of some use to her, life would not be worth the living. Even at Mrs. Carew's it was not all joy, for always there was Jamie; and Jamie brought thoughts of Pollyanna—unhappy thoughts.

Being thoroughly convinced that Jamie and Pollyanna cared for each other, and also being equally convinced that he himself was in honor bound to step one side and give the hand appeared Jamie full right of way, it never occurred to him to question further. Pollyanna he did not like to talk or to hear. He knew that both Jamie and Mrs. Carew heard from her; and when they spoke of her, he forced himself to listen, in spite of his heartache. But he always changed the subject as soon as possible, and he limited his letters to her to the briefest and most infrequent epistles possible. To Jimmy, a Pollyanna that was not his was nothing but a source of pain and wretchedness; and he had been glad when the time came for him to leave Beldingsville, and take up his studies again in Boston; to be so near Pollyanna, and yet so far from her, he found to be nothing but torture.

In Boston, with all the feverishness of a restless mind that seeks distraction from itself, he had thrown himself into the carrying out of Mrs. Carew's plans for her beloved girls, and such time as could be spared from his own duties he had devoted to this work, much to Mrs. Carew's light and gratitude.

And so for Jimmy the winter passed and spring had come—a blossoming spring full of soft

"My Hupmobile"

By the members of the American Family

They made no mistake in calling the Hupmobile the "Car of the American Family." It is a real institution with us. Speaking for myself, it is a wonderful time-saver, and it gives me a form of recreation I never tire of. The cost of running it and keeping it up is so trifling that I have quit keeping tabs. It would take some persuasion to induce me to give up the Hupmobile for another car.

Our Hupmobile is a great convenience to me. It enables me to shop and do errands in much less time, and it's so comfortable and easy that I delight in riding as often and as far as they will take me. It has helped me renew many old friendships. I know it can't cost us a great deal, for I never hear John say a word about it.

I'd almost rather drive a Hupmobile than eat. It's no trick for me to manage the car, down town or anywhere. It's got a lot of power and a fine-running motor. It hardly ever gets out of order. What few adjustments are needed are so simple I make them at home. It's never been in a repair shop.

It seems to me that my friends rather envy me because we have a Hupmobile. I know they like the car as well as I do, and I can't tell you how much I like it. There isn't a thing about it, I think, that could be better. Oh, yes, I drive when I want to. Our car is so easy to drive that I often wonder why other girls don't drive theirs.

I'm for the Hupmobile, every time. The fellows all think it's a bully car, and they can tell it from all the others on the street. Daddy says I'm not big enough to drive it yet, but I know I could if he'd only let me try. It's so easy, Art says. Gee, I'm glad we have a Hupmobile. I'd rather have it than any car.

gentle showers, and tender green buds expanding into riotous bloom and fragrance. To Jimmy, however, it was anything but a joyous spring, for in his heart was still nothing but a gloomy winter of discontent.

"If only they'd settle things and announce the engagement, once for all," murmured Jimmy to himself, more and more frequently these days. "If only I could know something for sure, I think I could stand it better!"

Then one day late in April he had his wish—a part of it: he learned "something for sure."

It was ten o'clock on a Saturday morning, and Mary, at Mrs. Carew's, had ushered him into the music-room with a well-trained: "I'll tell Mrs. Carew you're here, sir. She's expecting you, I think."

In the music-room Jimmy had found himself brought to a dismayed halt by the sight of Jamie at the piano, his arms outflung upon the rack, and his head bowed upon them. Pendleton had half turned to beat a soft retreat when the man at the piano lifted his head, bringing into view two flushed cheeks and a pair of fever-bright eyes.

"Why, Carew," stammered Pendleton, aghast, "has anything—er—happened?"

"Happened! Happened!" ejaculated the youth, flinging out both his hands, in each of which, as Pendleton now saw, was an open letter. "Everything has happened! Wouldn't you think it had if all your life you'd been in prison, and suddenly you saw the gates flung wide open? Wouldn't you think it had if all in a minute you could ask the girl you loved to be your wife? Wouldn't you think it had if—but listen! You think I'm crazy, but I'm not. Though maybe I am, after all, crazy with joy. I'd like to tell you. May I? I've got to tell somebody!"

Pendleton lifted his head. It was as if, unconsciously, he was bracing himself for a blow. He had grown a little white; but his voice was quite steady when he answered.

"Sure you may, old fellow. I'd be glad to hear it."

Carew, however, had scarcely waited for assent. He was rushing on, still a bit incoherently.

"It's not much to you, of course. You have your two feet and your freedom. You have your ambitions and your bridges. But I—to me it's everything. It's a chance to live a man's life and do a man's work, perhaps—even if it isn't dams and bridges. It's something!—and it's something I've proved now I can do! Listen. In that letter there is the announcement that a little story of mine has won the first prize—$3,000—in a contest. In the other letter there, a big publishing house accepts with flattering enthusiasm my first book manuscript for publication. And they both came today—this morning. Do you wonder I am crazy glad?"

"No! No, indeed! I congratulate you, Carew, with all my heart," cried Jimmy, warmly.

"Thank you—and you may congratulate me. Think what it means to me. Think what it means if, by and by, I can be independent like a man. Think what it means if I can, some day, make Mrs. Carew proud and glad that she gave the crippled lad a place in her home and heart. Think what it means for me to be able to tell the girl I love that I do love her."

"Yes—yes, indeed, old boy!" Jimmy spoke firmly, though he had grown very white now.

"Of course, maybe I ought not to do that last, even now," resumed Jamie, a swift cloud shadowing the shining brightness of his countenance. "I'm still tied to—these." He tapped the crutches by his side. "I can't forget, of course, that day in the woods last summer, when I saw Pollyanna—I realize that always I'll have to run the chance of seeing the girl I love in danger, and not being able to rescue her."

"Oh, but, Carew—" began the other huskily.

Carew lifted a peremptory hand. "I know what you'd say. But you can't understand. You aren't tied to two sticks. You're rescuing, not I. It came to me then how it would be, always, with me—Sadie. I'd have to stand aside and see others—"

"Sadie!" cut in Jimmy sharply. "Yes; Sadie Dean. You are surprised. Didn't you know? Haven't you suspected—how I felt toward Sadie?" cried Jamie. "Have I not so well to myself, then? I tried to, but—" He finished with a faint smile and a half-despairing gesture.

"Well, you certainly kept it all tight, old fellow—from me, anyhow," cried Jimmy, gayly. The color had come back to Jimmy's face in a rich flush, and his eyes had grown suddenly very bright indeed. "So it's Sadie Dean. Good! I congratulate you again, do, I do, as Nancy says." Jimmy was quite babbling with joy and excitement now, so great and wonderful had been the reaction within him at the discovery that it was Sadie, not Pollyanna, whom Jamie loved.

Jamie flushed and shook his head a bit sadly.

"No congratulations—yet. You see, I haven't spoken—to her. But I think she must know. I supposed everybody knew. Pray, who did you think it was, if not—Sadie?"

Jimmy hesitated. Then, a little precipitately, he answered: "What I'd thought of—Pollyanna."

Jamie smiled and pursed his lips. "Pollyanna's a charming girl, and I love her—but not that way, any more than she does me. Besides, I fancy somebody else would have something to say about that, eh?"

Jimmy colored like a happy-conscious boy.

"Do you?" he challenged, trying to make his voice properly impersonal.

"Of course! John Pendleton."

"John Pendleton!" Jimmy wheeled sharply.

"What about—John Pendleton?" queried a new voice; and Mrs. Carew came forward with a smile.

Jimmy, around whose ears for the second time within five minutes the world had crashed into fragments, barely collected himself enough for a low word of greeting. But Jamie unabashed, turned with a triumphant air of assurance.

"Nothing; only I just said that believed John Pendleton would have something to say about Pollyanna's loving anybody—but him."

"Pollyanna! John Pendleton!" Mrs. Carew sat down suddenly in the chair nearest her. If the two men before her had not been so deeply absorbed in their own affairs they might have noticed that the smile had vanished from Mrs. Carew's lips, and that an odd look as of almost fear had come to her eyes.

"Certainly," maintained Jamie. "Were you both blind last summer? Wasn't he with her a lot?"

"Why, I thought he was with all of us," murmured Mrs. Carew, a little faintly.

"Not as he was with Pollyanna insisted Jamie. "Besides, have you forgotten that day when we were talking about John Pendleton's marrying and Pollyanna blushed and stammered and said finally that he had thought of marrying—once. Well, I worried then if there wasn't something between them. Don't you remember?"

"Y—yes, I think I do—now that you speak of it," murmured Mrs. Carew again, in a low voice. "But I'd forgotten it."

"Oh, but I can explain that," said Jimmy, wetting his dry lips. John Pendleton did have a love affair, but it was with Pollyanna's mother."

"Pollyanna's mother!" exclaimed two voices in surprise.

"Yes. He loved her years ago, but she did not care for him at all, understand. She had another lover—a minister, and she married him instead—Pollyanna's father."

"Oh—h!" breathed Mrs. Carew and

The Dollar Watch

Before the INGERSOLL—watches were a luxury

The story of the watch begins with the making of the first main-spring some four hundred years ago, and is, after all, but the briefest of chapters in the history of human inventiveness and endeavor.

But for three of those centuries the watch was carried only by the high-born or wealthy, and only of late has it come fully into its own.

That today a reliable time-keeper has passed out of the sphere of the luxuries and has become one of the necessities of life is mainly due to the man who conceived and made the INGERSOLL dollar watch.

leaned forward suddenly in her chair. "And is that why he's—never married?"

"Yes," avouched Jimmy. "So you see there's really nothing to that idea at all—that he cares for Pollyanna. It was her mother."

"On the contrary, I think it makes a whole lot to that idea," declared Jamie, wagging his head wisely. "I think it makes my case all the stronger. Listen. He once loved the mother. He couldn't have her. What more absolutely natural than that he should love the daughter now—and win her?"

"Oh, Jamie, you incorrigible spinner of tales!" reproached Mrs. Carew, with a nervous laugh. "This is no ten-penny novel. It's real life. She's too young for him. He ought to marry a woman, not a girl—that is, if he marries any one, I mean," she stammeringly corrected.

"Perhaps; but what if it happens to be a girl that he loves?" argued Jamie stubbornly. "And, really, just stop and think. Have we had a single letter from her that hasn't told of his being there? And you know he's always talking of Pollyanna in his letters."

Mrs. Carew got suddenly to her feet. "Yes, I know," she murmured, with an odd little gesture, as if throwing something distasteful aside. "But—" She did not finish her sentence, and a moment later she had left the room.

When she came back in five minutes she found, much to her surprise, that Jimmy had gone.

"Why, I thought he was going with us on the girls' picnic!" she exclaimed.

"So did I," frowned Jamie. "But the first thing I knew he was explaining or apologizing or something about unexpectedly having to leave town, and he'd come to tell you he couldn't go with us. Anyhow, the next thing that I knew he'd gone. You see,"

Jamie's eyes were glowing again—"I don't think I knew quite what he did say, anyway. I had something else to think of." And he jubilantly spread before her the two letters which all the time he had still kept in his hands.

"Oh, Jamie!" breathed Mrs. Carew, when she had read the letters through. "How proud I am of you!" Then suddenly her eyes filled with tears at the look of ineffable joy that illumined Jamie's face.

CHAPTER XXVIII

JIMMY AND JOHN

IT WAS a very determined, square-jawed young man that alighted at the Beldingsville station late that Saturday night. And it was an even more determined, square-jawed young man that, before ten o'clock the next morning, stalked through the Sunday-quiet village streets and climbed the hill to the Harrington homestead. Catching sight of a loved and familiar flaxen coil of hair on a well-poised little head just disappearing into the summerhouse, the young man ignored the conventional front steps and doorbell, crossed the lawn, and strode through the garden paths until he came face to face with the owner of the flaxen coil of hair.

"Jimmy!" gasped Pollyanna, falling back with startled eyes. "Why, where did you—come from?"

"Boston. Last night. I had to see you, Pollyanna."

"To—see—m—me?" Pollyanna was plainly fencing for time to regain her composure. Jimmy had looked so big and strong and dear there in the door of the summerhouse that she feared her eyes had been surprised into a tell-tale admiration, if not more.

"Yes, Pollyanna; I wanted—that is, I thought—I mean, I feared—Oh, hang it all, Pollyanna, I can't beat about the bush like this. I'll have to come straight to the point. It's just this. I stood aside before, but I won't now. It isn't a case any longer of fairness. He isn't crippled like Jamie. He's got feet and hands and a head like mine, and if he wins he'll have to win in a fair fight. I've got some rights!"

The Gillette on the Firing Line

OUT of the war-torn trenches there comes a remarkable letter. Written by a young officer to his uncle here in America, who had sent him a Gillette Safety Razor.

"I thank you very much for the welcome Gillette Razor," he writes.

"Not only myself but nearly all of my men are using this razor. It is passed around among them, and one may see men using it at any time of the day or night.

"Sometimes there is no hot water, but the razor works well without it.

"The razor has been used many hundred times, but it still looks like new and will outlast the war if it is not blown to pieces by some of the flying fragments of bursting shells which often whistle about our heads."

Thousands of men under all the warring flags are using the Gillette Safety Razor—on the battle-field of the Marne, in East Prussia and the snow-blocked passes of the Carpathians.

It illustrates the adaptability of the Gillette to every man's habits, needs and circumstances. In little more than ten years, the Gillette Safety Razor has been adopted by men all over the civilized globe.

Gillette Safety Razors and Blades are sold in 145,000 retail stores throughout the world. Gillette dealers in every community. Gillette Razors, $5 to $50. Gillette Blades, 50c. and $1 the packet—No Stropping, No Honing.

A CHIP OF THE OLD BLOCK

SURE, I shave myself! Whom did you think I shaved? Oh, yes, it took me some time to learn. I began learning when I was in my teens.

My mother had, for some weeks, been constantly sending me to the bathroom to wash my face. I really washed it, too; but I couldn't satisfy her. I was just at the age when boys begin to recognize the existence of whisk brooms, tooth powder and shoe-shining outfits. I was beginning to care how I looked; and the constant reiteration of the charge against my countenance greatly offended my rapidly growing sense of manly dignity. Finally, after I had been sent back the third time in one afternoon, I got a hand mirror, faced the strong light of the west windows, and scrutinized closely the region of my mouth, which was the particular portion of my face that seemed most susceptible to soil, according to my mother's complaints. I looked and trembled and looked again and triumphed. It wasn't dirt, it was hair! My upper lip and chin were shadowed by the softest, silkiest down that ever sprouted in the soil of masculinity; at least that was the way I felt about it. I suppressed the shout with which I was tempted to announce my great discovery, and slipped out to my shop. I got out my oil-stone and sharpened my jack-knife until it would shave the back of my hand. Then I quietly crept back to the bath-room, made a lather with my mother's toothbrush and some Pear's soap, and quickly and cleanly removed the offending smudge from my lip and chin. When my mother had pronounced my face really clean, I calmly and with great dignity apprised her of the enormity of her mistake. Even her contemptuous declaration that it had looked like dirt failed to dim the glory of my onrushing manhood. My chum had been shaving for six months and had even cut himself twice. I need no longer envy him.

I found an old razor of my uncle's which I took to the barber's to get honed and put in shape. I walked into the shop and handed the implement to old "Fritz" with as much nonchalance as I could muster. Fritz looked at me and then at the old blade. "Vot you tink you do mit dot, hey?" he said. Old man Evans was waiting his turn. He came over and looked at my face carefully through his spectacles. "Pooh!" he said; "go home and put cream on your face and let the cat lick it." My face flamed and my tongue just simply wouldn't act. The rest of the barber-shop crowd passed me advice of various tenor, recommending sand-paper, Turkish-toweling, muriatic acid, which was guaranteed to make shaving unnecessary forever, and even my mother's scissors. Goaded into action at last, I blurted out that I had shaved, the day before, with my jack-knife and didn't need any scissors; and then I faded away under the storm of laughter and further advice which threatened to overwhelm me. I went back for that razor after the shop had closed; and I used it faithfully until the beard really began to assume sufficient character to resist the blade. Then I fell a victim to the lure of the luxury of the barber-shop, and did not attempt to shave myself again until I went to college.

When I was getting my things together, preparing for college, I came across this old razor and made an attempt to shave with it. The attempt was not entirely successful; but it suggested to me the advisability of shaving myself, to save, while under expense in school, the money that shaves would cost. I again had it put in order, and, to make assurance doubly sure, I went to the hardware store and paid $2.50 for a new razor. My mother had hand-painted a mug for me and I bought a strop. I felt that I was at last emancipated from the thralldom of the barber chair. The first time I shaved myself I got the hair off so easily that I felt foolish, as I thought of the shaves I had paid for. The second time the razor pulled a bit, and a careless slip opened a big leak in the point of my chin. I was half an hour later at a freshman class-meeting, all on account of that slash; but I had saved fifteen cents anyway and I would learn in time. The barber's careless slip of his razor on his strop had ways of looking ridiculously easy to me, but I found it hard to simulate. I developed a pain in my forearm, several times in my strop and a serious unimpaired in the edge of my razors; each attempt. Nevertheless I persisted and each successive shave brought new terrors. The new razor especially became an instrument of torture. At last I found myself lacking the necessary courage for another attempt. I decided to take the razors to the college barber-shop and buy one while they were being put in order. There was now no thralldom, the barber's chair. I sank down in the safety of that plush cushion and more tasted luxury. I took the razors back to my room when the barber returned them with his guarantee of their renewed efficiency; but I thought too much of the keenness of their edges to risk again the ruin they would follow on their use. I decided to keep them in reserve until some emergency should make their use necessary.

The emergency did not come until my own case during my college life, but, in my junior year, a few of us stayed at school to make up work during the Easter vacation. The college barber-shop was closed. One of the boys had a "date" and that required a shave. I had the only shaving equipment in the house and was the only one of the fellows who had ever had the least experience in handling such tools, although I admitted that my experience was not a recommendation of my skill. Air was had talked it over, pro and con, with the fellow with the date, which was momentarily getting nearer, decided to take his life in his hands and let me shave him. I did it; but, when I had finished, his map looked like a little-ground in Flanders. I did my best, I was as careful as I could be, but shins will occur and some fellows are a fully thin-skinned anyway. He kept his date, more or less disguised with burnt-plaster; and, for more than a week, he didn't wear his face on the street except after night. I had no other opportunities to perform as a barber.

My shaving tools continued to lead an idle life until I approached marriage. I felt that some economy would be necessary in the household that was to be; and I saw difficulties ahead for me, if I tried to urge careful spending on the part of the future "other half" of the house when I was dropping about $1 a week in the barber-shop. I talked it over with my barber and he looked over my equipment and said it was all wrong. He sold me some new razors, a new strop and a honing stone, and showed me how to use them; and summoned up all my moral courage and tried again. A styptic pencil proved the most useful adjunct of my new equipment. It took all the capacity for persecution inherited from a long line of Puritan ancestors to nerve me for each return of the lather brush and its succeeding torment; but I stuck to it. It was evident, however, that nature had not intended me for a topographical artist, although it was possible that she had spoiled a dandy surgeon. Then some friend suggested a safety razor.

Sure, I shave myself. Who did you think I shaved?

Why do mothers, the world over, prefer it for the delicate, sensitive skins of their children?

Why is it the talcum that doctors and nurses endorse?

That there is no talcum like Mennen's is more than a mere belief handed down from one generation to the next.

The Mennen formula has never been successfully duplicated. It is the pioneer, original Borated Talcum, and is today the standard of comparison among talcums.

For prickly heat, rash, eczema, tender raw skin and chafing, Mennen's is bringing relief and comfort to millions of babies all over the world. Give your baby the benefit of the exceptional soothing and healing properties of the Mennen formula.

For sale by more than 100,000 dealers.

Mennen's Talcum can now be obtained in a variety of tints and perfumes, all made according to the famous Mennen formula, as follows: Borated, Violet, Sen Yang, Narangia (a rich cream color), or Flesh Tint (not a rouge, but a delicate pink talcum). Send 5 cents for sample of any one variety, or 25 cents for samples of all five.

Resinol Soap

helps keep the skin fresh and youthful

If you want a clear, fresh, youthful complexion, use Resinol Soap at least once a day. Work a warm, creamy lather of it well into the pores, then rinse the face with plenty of cold water. It does not take many days of such regular care with Resinol Soap to show an improvement, because the Resinol medication soothes and refreshes the skin, while the pure, alkali-free soap is cleansing it. Resinol Soap is excellent as a shampoo, keeping the hair live, thick and lustrous.

Resinol Soap is not artificially colored, its rich brown being entirely due to the Resinol medication it contains. Twenty-five cents at all druggists and dealers in toilet goods. For a guest-room size trial cake, write Dept. 15-G, Resinol, Baltimore, Md. Resinol Soap is especially suited to baby's tender, easily irritated skin.

THE MOLD OF HEROINES

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

BEFORE the war Eva Barath was a Hungarian telegraph operator. She sat on a chair in front of a switchboard and plugged at keys and sent out code messages (isn't that what telegraph operators do?), and received many astonishing or commonplace messages in reply. I do not doubt that some mornings seemed very blue to her as she left her warmed and started for work; I would not be surprised to know that often, in the dull, tired evenings, she wished, as she guarded the singing wires, that she was a rich girl who could sit on a satin-covered divan and eat chocolates and read, with never a care to worry her. We all at times have wished that same wish,—distorted, perhaps, or painted a little differently on the outside—but the same wish.

Before the war Eva Barath was a telegraph operator. But now that the war has been raging for three-quarters of a year she has stepped lightly before the public eye, and folk read about her and honor her. For Eva Barath is a heroine. This is the story:

The telegraph office where Eva worked was on the Servian frontier, and one day the girl, used by that time to the distant rumble of guns, was surprised and probably frightened to hear them coming very near. Before she could realize the fact, grasp it in her brain, she knew by the terrifying whirr of bullets and crash of machine guns that the battle was being fought only a breathing space from the door of her office.

In a case like that I think a great majority of girls—girls brought up to dull work and utter peace—would have hurried as fast as possible from the spot, leaving their work unfinished and their hat and coat on the peg by the door. Eva Barath didn't. She crouched low over her desk and, with an eye to the battle, began to plug at the little keys. A clicking sound answered her efforts. She was wiring news of the battle to headquarters. The shots rang heavily about her, and the air grew thick with smoke and horrible with screams. Oftentimes the little building rocked on its foundations and the instrument itself, perhaps, almost broke. But Eva Barath stayed at her post until the office was destroyed by a Servian shell. Then, when she could no longer be of service to her country, she thought of herself.

She had been a telegraph operator when she walked in to work that morning, but she was a heroine when she left. It was not many days before all Hungary was honoring her, not many days before she wore the country's highest reward, "the Cross of the Order of Merit," on the front of her simple little waist.

It wasn't so long ago that the United States was thanking a girl who was as brave as Eva Barath in circumstances just about as trying. She was a telephone central, and it was during a great flood that she sat at her switchboard, while the water whirled up about her, warning folk of the terrible menace that crept toward them, swiftly, quietly, like a wolf in the night. She sent after message until the valley of flood was filled with hurrying who climbed to high places, where they watched their homes go down brave deed of the humble telegraph girl.

It's a wonderful thing to think the divine workings of Providence when it comes to heroes and heroines. The operator on the Servian frontier might have been the coward at home; wasn't; the girl who telephoned news of the flood might just as well have fled to safety, but she didn't. Providence had cast their natures as hearts in the heroic mold, as the hero of trial proved.

I went to luncheon a few weeks ago and heard several girls talking about bravery, and critical situations, and heroines. I heard them wondering what they would do—if the home came; what they would say—they had to say anything; how they would act—if it was necessary for them to act at all.

"I," said a fluffy little girl with large eyes, and an appealing mouth, and small hands that made ineffectual butterfly gestures, "I know that I could never be brave. I know that I never win an Iron Cross or a Legion of Honor medal if I were a heroine. Why, at the first shot I would drop flat on the ground and hope that the bullets would fly over me; or I'd go behind a huge tree and pray that the guns would point in some other direction. If they came nearer at that I'd—I'd desert!" She laughed a bit daintily into an olive.

A tall girl with a dark, intelligent face spoke up.

"I'm ashamed to hear you talk that way, Alicia," she said a trifle sharply. "You don't mean it—not a bit. You're only saying it to sound cunning. Why I'd like nothing better than to lead a troop under fire, a troop of heroes that listened to my voice, and followed for my step, and followed me to death if need be! Think of that and the excitement!"

"And the shrieks, and the blood, and the dying, and the machine guns, interposed the small blond girl.

The dark girl opened her mouth, the very movement looked like a bang almost. Her eyes flashed, and she turned away, as a young man d'Arc might have turned away.

I listened to them in silence, and am rather inclined to think that sympathized with the little timid girl. I didn't exactly imagine that I would "thrill" at the sound of bugles, or be "excited" at the thought that I was leading others, perhaps to victory, probably to death. And as I thought very quietly about it all, I studied the two faces, the blond childish one and the dark, stern, thoughtful one. I wondered vaguely what lay under the calm exteriors. I wondered if either of their hearts were cast in the mold of heroines, or if their words were little, insignificant things. I wondered, if there ever came a time of doing deeds, when there would be no time for talking, how each girl would act. Perhaps a gesture of the butterfly hand might do more toward quieting a panic, or soothing a multitude, or leading a troop than a flash of command from the dark eyes.

Friends of mine, you must not say how you will act if something happens. Go along, day by day, doing your regular tasks, and in that way prepare yourself for the emergency that you may some time have to meet. Eva Barath was able to be brave by doing, at an exceptional time, the same thing that she had always done, while others were trying to do something different. Most heroines are made that way.

As for the mold—well, the mold of heroines is perhaps life and the conventions and the fears of life, that at times hide the real value that lies inside. But when the crisis comes, the moment of emergency, when hands tremble and brains whirl, when the coward is miraculously brave, and the brave one shows the white feather, if we have allowed the mold to shape us—our minds, our characters and our hearts—we shall come out with proud step and bright eyes, and folk will call us heroines.

Rushing American Supplies to the Front

THE press of March 25 reported a contract for the erection of new buildings by the Nitrate Products Company of Mount Carbon, Pa., to be rushed to completion by the middle of April, for the manufacture of a new secret high explosive under contracts with European nations, that will keep the factory busy for a year. The capitalization of this new plant, the item stated, comes from New York, Philadelphia and the town of Pottsville, Pa.

According to the press of March 31, eighteen big guns, of a caliber of either fourteen or sixteen inches, were about to be shipped from Seattle to an unnamed destination in Europe, presumably Russia. These guns, the item stated, are the product of the Bethlehem Steel Works. Every plant in the United States capable of turning out rifled cannon and small arms, according to the New York Evening Mail, is stacked up with orders for a full year ahead, and contracts have been made extending over a period of two and three years. It is pointed out that the continuance of the war is very largely dependent upon the ability of belligerents to replenish their death-dealing supplies from this country.

The Bethlehem Steel Corporation stated in its annual report, made public Saturday, March 27, that its unfilled orders amounted to $46,513,189, as against $24,865,560 in 1913. Manufacturing profits of the company last year, including amounts expended for ordinary and extraordinary repairs and maintenance, were $12,247,385; the net profits, after deducting repairs and maintenance, $9,378,385, an increase of $847,677 over 1913, and of $4,531,571 over 1912. It was generally known that the Bethlehem Company was prospering prodigiously on account of orders and shipment of war materials, but the publication of this report so far surpassed the expectations of speculators that 26,000 shares were sold during the day, the price jumping from 67 3/4 to 76. By the following Tuesday the company's stock reached 91 1/2.

PAIGE

"The Standard of Value and Quality"

Another Element of Paige Prestige

Distinctiveness

PAIGE CARS are more than merely beautiful cars—they are distinctively beautiful cars.

No matter where you may meet a Paige—on the road or parked among many other cars—you will recognize it instantly. Long and graceful—the very embodiment of power and dignity—this car stands out among all other motor cars with an individuality all its own. Quite unconsciously you find yourself saying, "There goes a Paige Six." And you utter these words either with the Pride or Desire of Ownership.

No discriminating man or woman can resist the appeal of the exquisite European stream lines—the impressive "bonnet"—the roomy seating accommodations for seven passengers—the modish one-man top and soft leather upholstery. So go to the Paige dealer today. Let him give you a demonstration in either the "Four" or "Six." This is the first step—and a sure step—to Paige ownership.

The supreme dollar-for-dollar value of Paige Cars is established by comparing them, feature for feature, with any and all other motor cars of lower, equal and higher price. We don't have to ask the intelligent purchaser to make that comparison.

In Christ's Own Country

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.
President The World's Christian Endeavor Union

"IT is my desire in this volume to be eyes and ears and feet for my readers. . . . We will view together not only the holy spots which thousands of travelers, at the expense of thousands of dollars, have traveled thousands of miles to see, but we will occasionally stop to look at the people in their shops, in the coffee houses, in their homes and at their bench."

With Christ in Thought

Dr. Clark not only takes us to the land of Christ, but brings Christ back to it. He wipes away both time and distance, and brings us side by side with the Master.

With Him we walk the ways that He walked, see the scenes as He saw them, and mingle with the people with whom He mingled.

We are truly with Christ in His own Country.

Equal to Dr. Clark's great power of description is his rare power of spiritual interpretation. He brings us side by side with Christ both in sense and spirit.

We seem not only to feel His presence and to hear Him speak; we thrill at His touch, and our minds and souls open wide to His message. We seem to see the miracles done with our own eyes. The parables come with new and deeper meaning.

Evangelist Sunday's Mission and Methods

Mr. Sunday invariably has his audiences with him from the start. They are sufficiently informed in morals, in the Christian religion and in church life to instantly appreciate his ruthless blows at human weakness and human perversity, his stinging characterizations of shams in church and out, his keen logic and his appeals to sentiment. They laugh at his most telling blows, but seldom cry. They applaud him when he shows them their own pet sins. They evince the greatest interest in his message, but little emotion. It is impossible to speak of his audience as overwhelmed by a conviction of personal sin. What he has to say seems to be received as a company of earnest students might listen to the closing address of their collegiate year. When he finishes those who are ready for the step make the great confession.

AND right here the organization again takes up its work. Immediately the watchful personal workers and ushers note that the evangelist is through, and that he means that the trail-hitting shall begin, they are at work throughout the audience, and especially among those concerning whose readiness to respond they have been previously advised, inviting, urging, persuading, encouraging men and women to hit the trail. The choir has also begun its appealing songs. Everybody is standing up. The full current of all the influences that have been at work focuses upon this moment. It is the moment for which Billy Sunday plans and works. And presently, down the saw-dust aisles come the trail-hitters, to grasp the evangelist's hand and seat themselves in the places assigned, to have their names enrolled for the information of the churches of the city. Upon their faces are earnest expressions, often smiles, sometimes tears, sometimes doubt; but always sincerity. How many of them are backslidden Christians returning to their allegiance, how many are at last yielding to loving pressure that has been brought to bear on them for years, how many are sinners saved by grace then and there, no man may even venture to guess. But whatever they are, they are the visible results that Evangelist Sunday gets.

One other result that must be included, but which does not lend itself to discussion here, is the reinvigorated churches into whose care the converts are committed, and which are left by the Sunday campaign to develop the newly awakened religious feelings in the community. He puts it up to the church. His work is done. He gives the church a new chance.

No account has been attempted in this article to discuss Mr. Sunday's personality. What has interested the writer at this time has been the evangelist's wonderful organization of forces and their cumulative effect in producing concrete results. Pre-eminence in this field must be accorded to the Rev. W. A. Sunday. He is a master at organizing for a common purpose the press, the church and the people.

He has shown that churches can work in unison. Men and women will engage in neighborhood prayer meetings, Bible classes and even evangelistic services; men will train themselves for special personal work in public meetings; singers will devote their talents to arduous chorus work; business men will open their doors to emissaries of the church; busy men and women will give freely of their time, their means and abilities in committee work; and the people themselves will throng to hear the message of the Gospel when presented in the atmosphere of such united and systematized endeavor. A word to the wise (church) is sufficient.

Addenda. Billy Sunday has preached in 21 cities in ten years, six, besides Pittsburg, having populations over 80,000; thank-offerings, $346,665.91.

THE TOWERS AND BULWARKS OF ZION

 from heaven toward you. The of God has been waiting long for some of you to grip the Hand that was wounded for you. Will you not let everything go and clasp the Saviour's hand?

The third bulwark in Zion is God's Love. Many years ago a man boarded a ship at an English port. An aged sailor stood close by and being well acquainted with the traveler he asked him if he was leaving for America.
 The man answered in the affirmative.
 The old sailor said: "You know my wayward boy who left us years ago and from whom we have never heard a word since his departure. If you see him in America, just say to him,
 'Yr father loves you still.'" When Jesus left heaven to come to this dark world of sin and death, God said: "Tell them I love them still." The message was faithfully delivered, but the response in the human race was so small that they cruelly murdered the Prince of Life. But he broke the bands of death and proclaimed liberty to all who will believe on his name. Every child of God can say with Isaiah:
 "Thou hast loved my soul from the birth of corruption."

When I see some man made over again, and know that he has found Christ and saved his home as well as his soul, I thank God, and take courage.
 God gives us the right advice when he says, "Consider her palaces." The homes of Zion are homes of prayer, been strong. Being ambitious to my studies on account of nervous prostration and hysteria.

My food did not agree with me, and I grew thin and despondent. I could not enjoy the simplest social affair for I suffered constantly from nervousness in spite of all sorts of medicines.

This wretched condition continued until I became interested in the letters of those who had cases like mine and who were being helped by eating Grape-Nuts.

I had little faith, but procured a packet and after the first dish I experienced a peculiar satisfied feeling that I had never gained from any ordinary food. I slept and rested better that night and in a few days began to grow stronger.

I had a new feeling of peace and contentment. In a few weeks, to my great joy, the headaches and nervousness left me and life became bright and hopeful.

consecration, purity, honor, good citizenship, for this reason: "God is known in her palaces for a refuge." Oh, my countrymen, when will we place God first in our homes as our refuge? When we have the knowledge of his presence and blessing we see the wisdom of obeying the next exhortation of the text: "Tell it to the generation following."

For Ever and Ever

WE hear much about the culture and erudition of the present century. We have profited by the mistakes and successes of the people who have lived before us. We do not hesitate to tell our booklore to the generation following. We want our children to know all they possibly can learn of useful and indispensable knowledge.
 Their future success depends upon what we do for them along this line.
 God pity those who are willing to tell their children about earthly things, but are too wicked and godless to tell them about heavenly things. The devil can come into our homes and inject the poison of hell into the hearts of the children and not a word of advice is given. Men and women tell the generation following all about the art of money-making. They are told about the social amenities of public and private life. But in the majority of homes God is denied, the Bible is not loved or taught, and while morality is neglected, evil habits are formed. If the message of God is worth believing, it is worth telling to the generation following. I pity the children who are never told the story of God's love to a lost world. They are starved in soul.
 It is a sin in the sight of God to be indifferent about the salvation of the generation following. When you fail to tell them of Christ the responsibility of their eternal welfare is upon you.

In closing I desire to direct your thoughts to the last words of the text:
 "For this God is our God forever and ever; he will be our Guide even unto death." These gracious words give us the rich assurance that there is victory now and hope beyond the grave for every one of us if we will claim our heritage in Christ Jesus. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace."
 There is no greater hope offered than that of these words. "He will be our Guide even unto death." We will need some one to light the way before us when we enter the Valley of the Shadow of Death.

Children at Church

THE Go-to-Church Band Movement is spreading rapidly, for sixty-nine churches formed bands for the spring term of four months, and there are now 216 bands located in 33 states and in the seven leading denominations.

Three thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven children made a perfect record at church attendance for the four months ending with January, and three hundred and fifty-nine of these had attended church without failure for as much as twelve months and some of them have gone thirty-six or forty months without an absence.

Several churches have each had over one hundred members make perfect records. Over eighteen thousand young people and children are enrolled for the term ending with May.

The pastor of the First Congregational Church of Oregon City, Ore., writes as follows regarding his band:

You will be interested, I think, to know that one little boy who had come faithfully to church for four months without his parents, was attended on the Sunday the awards were made by his father and mother and little brother. They sat in a front seat, heard a sermon on the family in the church, and the boy not only started on his second term, but his parents also seem to have resolved to keep him company. They had scarcely entered the church in a year.

One of the first buildings to rise out of the ashes of the Chicago Fire was the temporary office of the Hartford Fire Insurance Company. During the terrible days that followed this disaster, one by one, forty-five fire insurance companies gave up a hopeless fight and confessed their insolvency.

 The Hartford, however, though faced with a loss of $1,933,562.04, sent a notice to its agents saying—"Vast as is this sum, it will be bravely met and honorably paid." The claims were paid as fast as they could be adjusted, and in less than four months the Hartford had settled every loss without a single case of litigation.

It is not likely that you will ever suffer in so vast a conflagration. But whether your loss be large or small, it is mighty comforting to know that the name
 Hartford Fire Insurance Company is on your policy.

In the Franco-Prussian War he organized a corps of volunteers which took part in that war on the French side. His son was the leader of the Italia Irredenta movement, which climaxed in a riot in Rome in 1878, the accounts of which read very much as do the accounts of the riot on Sunday, March 28, 1915, in the same city. His grandson, the present General Garibaldi, is also a leader of the Italia Irredenta movement, a soldier of fortune, and has also organized a corps of volunteers to fight for France in the war of today. Neither the son nor the grandson of the great Garibaldi have ever been considered in Italy men of force, and had it not been for the name they bear it is very doubtful if either would ever have been heard of.

The Syndicalists somewhat resemble the I. W. W., which, for a moment, were rather prominent in the United States, and exercise about as much influence on the responsible politicians in Rome as do the I. W. W.'s on the heads of the Washington Government. These two forces have been the main ones moving for intervention in Italy. Bulgaria, Greece and Rumania have all during the week reiterated their announcement that their attitude would be neutral.

The western line of battle has continued quiet during the week. True, there have been some skirmishes in the Argonne and in the Vosges, and the usual artillery duels at various places on the long line, but except at two points none of the movements have had any results in more than a few yards' change of position, without tactical value. Around Verdun there have been movements of importance, and Paris admits for the first time that the Germans have succeeded in getting within artillery range of the chain of forts defending that city. The northeasterly group, which comprises Forts de Belleville, de Donaumont, de Souville, de St. Michel, de Vaux and de Tavannes, is the point of attack, and Fort de Donaumont, the most advanced of the group, is the fort now being shelled.

While this was going on to the northeast of the fortress, on the south-east, on March 29, the French scored a victory of some importance. They succeeded in forcing the Germans to evacuate the village of Heudicourt, to the northeast of St. Mihiel. This place is on the road from Apremont to Vigneulles, and if well held will be capable of forming a base point from which an attack on St. Mihiel itself can be launched; so this gain has a tactical importance.

The situation in Serbia is rapidly growing very serious. The epidemic of spotted typhus is apparently beyond control, and this terrible disease spreads so rapidly that unless it is gotten in hand at once there is very grave danger of its spreading beyond the Serbian borders in all the adjacent countries, with incalculable effects, particularly as the spring favors its ravages.

The war cloud in the Far East is growing, apparently. In fact, in one despatch it is said without concealment that China fears that war with Japan is coming, and May 1 is given as the approximate date of the opening of hostilities. At the conference at Tokyo between the Japanese statesmen and the Chinese representatives, inquiry was made by the Chinese, it is said, as to the meaning of the recent entrance of Japanese troops into China. The reply was made that these troops were intended to relieve the present garrisons, but that all the Japanese troops would remain in China until the conclusion of the negotiations between China and Japan, presumably by way of stimulus to China. There are eight divisions, it is thought, of Japanese troops now in China and Korea, or approximately 108,000 men.

The German submarines have been active during the week and have sunk several vessels; in one case there was a very considerable loss of life. Since the submarine campaign began, forty-two merchant vessels have been sunk to April 1, an average of one a day.

Little has been done in the Ardennes during the past week. The nine sweepers have been at work more or less constantly, but there has been no assault on the forts by the fleet. Turkey has greatly increased her flying corps, and now has, it is said, thirty machines at this point. These have attacked the fleet with bombs, but do not seem to have done any damage of moment.

The Eastern campaign has been a little brisker this week than last. The Austrians have carried the war into Southern Russia, according to the admissions in the Russian bulletins. A column variously estimated at 40,000 to 75,000 strong has advanced eastward out of Bukovina and, crossing the frontier, penetrated Russian territory to a point in the immediate vicinity of the town of Cholin in Bes-sarabia, driving the Russians before them. Cholin is on the Dniester river, about thirty-five miles north of Czernowitz, the capital of Bukovina.

The present effect of this advance is to drive back the end of the Russian left wing in Galicia the above distance. The future effect will be, if the operation is carried out successfully, its logical objective, to turn that wing, but this, of course, is not yet achieved, nor has this movement progressed far enough to enable us to have any basis for forecasting the probable result.

On the rest of the Galician front there are strong indications that a large German, not Austrian, force has been quietly concentrated at two points to the south of the Carpatians, and this force will enter into action in a very brief period.

The actual fighting of the past week has been mostly at and around the Dukla Pass, and here the Russians have managed to break through the Austrian defense and drive them backward out of the pass, and themselves penetrate into Hungary, and have now nearly reached Bartfeld. For a couple of days the Austrians put up a stiff fight, but finally gave way with heavy losses.

At the other passes they managed to hold the ground in spite of repeated Russian assaults, and there has as yet been no trial of strength on the Majec River, where are located the old defenses of Cracow. In fact, up to the present time everything points to the Russians making their great effort towards Hungary and not in the direction at all.

In southern and central Poland there has not been much activity, and the lines have hardly changed at all from the position occupied last week. Apparently for the time being, at least, no frontal assault on the Russian position is contemplated by the Germans, who are too strongly entrenched to render a Russian assault practicable.

On the other, the northern side of the Vistula, the already acquired positions seem to be held without change until we reach Ostrolenka. Around this town there has been some violent fighting, and the Germans have made some slight gains. Ossowetz is still surrounded and the siege is still going on, though the activity this week has not been as great as last. There has been some fighting to the northeast of Augustowo without much result, the town still remaining in German hands, as does Suwalki farther north.

Directly to the east of Suwalki at Krasnopol, has been the heaviest fighting of the week, which resulted in the Germans taking the town and advancing farther eastward, forcing the Russians to retreat to Seiny. This is a lake district, somewhat resembling the Masurian region. Farther north there has been some indecisive fighting near Mariampol, and still farther north the Russians were driven out of Tauroggen.

If Children Served the Breakfast

Do You Think That Any Table Would Lack Puffed Wheat or Rice?

Most homes, of course, would serve these dainties if children had their way.

Not for breakfast only, but in bowls of milk at night. Also dry, like nut meats, for between-meal foods. These toasted grains, puffed to eight times normal size, are fascinating tit-bits to the young.

To grown-ups, too. A big dairy lunch room found that four out of five men who took ready-cooked cereals chose either Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice.

Why Not Please Them?

Yet these food confections—these bubbles of grain—are better than they taste. Never were whole grains so fitted for food as they are by this Anderson process.

Here they are toasted for an hour. Here they are steam exploded. Here every food granule, for ease of digestion, is literally blasted to pieces. Every authority knows this to be the hygienic form of grain food.

Don't you think that children who like Puffed Grains should enjoy them to their hearts' content?

Wheat bread, for instance, is simply baked. When you want it more digestible you toast it.

Puffed Grains are baked and super-toasted, for 60 minutes, in 550 degrees of heat.

Then comes the unique preparation. A hundred million steam explosions are caused inside each kernel. Thus Puffed Wheat and Rice are triple-cooked, and each cooking is heroic. They deserve a high place in your food list.

The FRANKLIN CAR

The Most Talked about Fine Car in the Country Today

THERE was a man Bishop Vincent used to tell about who prayed that he might become well enough off so that he could afford to be economical.

When it comes to the basis upon which we maintain either the necessities or the luxuries of life well-to-do people have an unquestioned advantage.

It was the well-to-do man who first began to apply a mental taximeter to his heavy automobile, and found the cost of mileage too high for what he got out of it.

The fact that he could afford the expense better than his neighbor never appealed to him as an argument. He disliked waste. That was one reason why he was well-to-do.

Every time he looked at that big heavy body, with its weight added to rigid construction, he knew it was the cause of perpetual tire troubles and extravagant tire bills.

He said, "What I want is a fine light car."

That explains perhaps why such a large number of Franklin owners are of the well-to-do class of seasoned motorists.

It should mean even more to the buyer of small means—this ultimate economy of the Franklin.

As for the new motorist,—it should lead him to stretch a point if necessary in the matter of first cost.

The man who best appreciates the Franklin is the man who has owned and operated another car—any car. He has a basis for comparison.

This determination of buyers to face the facts and get the figures has made the Franklin the fastest-selling fine automobile in America.

The Franklin today represents the most difficult of all engineering achievements—the attainment of scientific light-weight, simplicity and easy riding qualities in a luxurious five-passenger touring car that costs less to maintain than the cheapest car made.

Automobile users everywhere have seen the U. S. Government's report showing the cost of operating a Franklin car in comparison with other makes.

The Franklin Direct-Air-Cooling-System does away with all useless complications—eliminates radiator leaks—frozen plumbing in winter and the trouble and annoyance of boiling water in hot weather.

In the recent engineers' test at the Mason Laboratory of Yale University, not only was the fuel mileage cost of the Franklin the lowest of any car tested: but under the strenuous conditions of the test, during the fastest runs and the heaviest pulling, the engine could not be overheated.

Get the facts. Any Franklin dealer can give them to you. The Franklin Six-Thirty Touring Car weighs 2750 pounds (scale weight) and the price is $2150.

Judge by What It Did

In this day of Light Sixes, with some 31 models, thousands of men ask, "Which is best?"

Can you pick out the coming leader in a crowd of college students? Or say what leading man of now will attain a monument?

Nor can you in cars. None can be judged by prospects or promises. The verdict of history alone is decisive.

Hudson Has a History

The HUDSON Light Six, in last year's model and this one, has been driven some 30 million miles in the hands of over 12,000 owners. What those men say is history. Any user will tell you that the HUDSON has proved itself faultless, sturdy, economical, ideal.

Then the history of former HUDSONS gives confidence in this. The HUDSON success is marvelous. And it grows with experience. HUDSON sales have trebled in the past two years.

The history of Howard E. Coffin, this car's famous designer, is another convincing factor. He is a 12-year leader in motor car engineering. His models have always been right. They have always established a new high mark in their class.

Is This-or-That Car Like the Hudson?

Our dealers are asked—perhaps a thousand times daily—"How does This-or-That car compare with the HUDSON?" Outside of appearance and evident features, no one can answer that.

The Light Six is a new type. In its creation, all oldtime standards had to be revised. It involves a new-type motor. It requires special steels. To attain this lightness a thousand parts had to be re-designed.

The Light Six, to be sturdy, must have exceptional quality. The questions of strength and endurance, upkeep and repair, must be answered by time and tests. In the HUDSON those questions are answered.

Waste is Unpopular

The Light Six is in vogue now because waste is unpopular. Needless size and weight, with their over-tax, offend the spirit of the times.

The HUDSON is this Light Six type carried to perfection. It shows the result of four years of refinement. Every part and detail shows the final touch. And it is a time-tested production.

Its supremacy shows in lines and finish, in luxury and equipment, in its evident class. These facts with its history, will make it your first choice. Now is the time to prove that—before the over-demand which comes to every leading model every spring.

7-Passenger Phaeton, $1550, f. o. b. Detroit
Four other body styles

The HUDSON Company never loses interest in the cars it sells. So long as a car is in service we maintain our interest in the character of its service. That's one great reason for HUDSON reputation.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

POLAND, NOW THE CENTER OF GREATEST SUFFERING. SHOWING WAR-DEVASTATED AREA, CONTRASTED WITH THAT OF BELGIUM AND FRANCE

MANY a land across the seas is today looking to the wheatfields of America for bread for the coming year, and to our prosperous citizens for relief from the pangs of hunger and homelessness, because there is no other land that can be appealed to today with like success. More than half the world is engaged in war, and the belligerent nations, however well-disposed, cannot be expected to do much for the unfortunate countries that have been ravaged by war, and whose lands have been made one great battlefield, since they have all that they can do to care for their own.

China with its hundreds of millions can scarcely be appealed to. Japan and South America, with the best of intentions, can do but comparatively little. The rest of the world, aside from the United States, is in the throes of the most awful war of the century. Where can these nations look, then, but to us, for relief and succor?

But they have not looked in vain, that they have not appealed to the generous hearts of Americans without result, is shown by the millions of dollars and the millions of tons of provisions which have gone across the seas to suffering Belgium as a result of these appeals.

Belgium is comparatively near our shores. The "European tripper" from America is pretty certain to have crossed her boundaries, if he did not linger in her ancient and beautiful cities. His sympathy would easily be aroused for the sufferers of Louvain and Liège, and that fair land that has been desolated.

But poor Poland is nearly one thousand miles farther away from us geographically, and much more than a thousand miles farther from us in knowledge and sympathy with the actual state of affairs. A score of voices have been raised for Belgium where one has been raised for Poland, and yet the needs of Poland are quite as great as those of her sister nation which has been desolated.

The famous author, M. Sienkiewicz, has said of Poland: "I do not wish to make any comparison with the sufferings of Belgium; they have been too fearful for words; but our needs touch 15,000,000 ruined people in a country seven times the size of Belgium, devastated by repeated passages of armies during the six months from the early days of August."

And Poland has peculiar claims upon our sympathies which even Belgium cannot urge. Comparatively few Belgians have found a home in this new land, but millions of Poles have contributed their brawn and sinew, the strength of their arms and the vigor of their brains, to the building of our own national fabric.

SUPPLIANT POLAND

As I have before written, "If the people of Polish ancestry, most of them in the first generation, who live in the United States, were massed in New England, they would occupy five states as populous as Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut and Rhode Island. Five sovereign states like these, if not the largest, are to be reckoned with in the sisterhood of commonwealths; and a country that in a generation can populate five such states, and is likely in another generation to people as many more, is worth the sympathetic consideration of every American."

MOREOVER, the contribution of Poland to America should be measured, not by its quantity alone, but by its quality. Some of the noblest men in the history of America have been of Polish descent. John of Kolno was a Pole, who discovered the coast of Labrador sixteen years, it is said, before Columbus made his memorable voyage. Soon after the Plymouth colony was settled by the Pilgrims, some distinguished Polish families came to the New Jersey coast. One of them was Chancellor of New Jersey; another, dean of Harvard College, and men of such names as Gouverneur Morris, the Bayards, the Jays, the Astors, can boast of the Polish blood that runs in their veins.

In our Revolutionary struggle, Polish sympathy was intensely with us, and their greatest hero, Kosciuszko, came over to fight our battles as a friend and aide of General Washington. Pulaski and Sadowsky have also left their names upon the map of America for the good work that they have done.

But not only have noble men of Poland fled across the sea to cast in their lot with America, but hundreds of thousands of humble, faithful, honest laborers have helped make our country what it is today. In the western part of Massachusetts, it is said that the advent of the Poles, with their intensive system of agriculture and their wise methods of horticulture, has doubled the value of much of the land in that part of the state. They have not only made comfortable homes and fortunes for themselves, but they have shown the native-born Americans how to do the same.

On the broader fields of the West with its larger opportunities the Poles are still more largely found. Such cities as Detroit and Milwaukee reckon in their directories a very large percentage of Polish names. In fact, in Wisconsin and Michigan every eighth person is a Pole; in Pennsylvania, one in twelve; and in New York, one in fourteen. It has been truly said: "As a rule they make good citizens. They are willing to pay the price to succeed, and that price is to work hard and save."

To go a little farther back, we must remember that not only America but all the civilized world owes an unpaid and almost unpayable debt to Poland. At one time in the world's history, it looked as though the Turks would overrun all Europe. They had planted their battalions at the very gates of Vienna. The king and the nobles fled in wild dismay. It looked as though the Moslems would overrun the whole of Europe and plant their minarets and their harems all over the Western lands. This was in the seventeenth century, when our own country was receiving its early colonists. If that had been the fate of Europe, it is almost inevitable that it would have in some degree been the fate of America, and the whole current of civilization would probably have been changed.

Just at the critical moment, Sobieski, the great Polish general, in 1683, set out from Cracow, the ancient capital of Poland. His cavalry was especially conspicuous for its splendid equipment. He launched himself and his forces against the Turks, shouting in Latin, "Not unto us, O Lord, but unto thy name give glory." Under his leadership were the veterans of Saxony, and the united armies were victorious all along the line. The Turks fled in wild dismay. Many thousands were killed, and a mere remnant of the army managed to cross the Danube again and reach Belgrade. This was one of the critical and decisive moments of the world's history, and a great Pole stemmed the tide of onrushing Mohammedanism, deserving the undying gratitude of the world.

Such is the great country which of late years has been divided between Russia, Austria and Prussia, and which deserves the sympathy of all Americans. Of the 127,000 square kilometers which comprise it, more than 100,000 have been devastated by the armed forces that have tramped back and forth across her devoted soil. More than a million horses and two million head of cattle have been seized by the invaders, of one side or the other, and in four-fifths of the country, we are told on good authority, "not one grain of corn, not a scrap of meat, nor a drop of milk, remained for the civil population. The material losses are estimated at $500,000,000, and no fewer than 400,000 workmen have lost their means of livelihood." This is in ancient Poland alone.

The condition of Galicia, or Austrian Poland, is almost as heart-breaking. Here the same levies were made upon the poor people. "Over a million inhabitants," we are told, "have sought refuge in other parts of Austria; they are in sheer destitution, wandering over the country with nothing but the clothes they are wearing."

Surely such a story of destitution will appeal to every generous heart in America, and will lead us to endeavor to secure the plaudit which the Master gave to the woman who broke the alabaster vase of ointment upon his head: "She hath done what she could."

THE first report from the Christian Herald Relief Committee from Holland will be found below. The need in Poland is so acute that we wish to add to Dr. Clark's eloquent appeal a few intimate words to our readers.

We are proceeding with all the expedition possible, under the conditions prevailing in Poland, to organize there a relief committee for the widows and orphans. A study of the map on the preceding page will show how tremendous must be the need. In the much smaller area of Belgium millions upon millions of dollars are being expended for the relief of the destitute, and to give families a new start in life, and yet into this vastly greater area comparatively little has thus far found its way. As Dr. Clark points out, neighboring nations cannot be looked to for adequate help at this time, though generous people of Germany have given almost a hundred thousand dollars, through their relief agents, to relieve the suffering.

There is no more inoffensive race than the Poles. They are not, of course, a nation now, but they still are a people. They are a nation in heart and always will be. They still regard the territory they occupy as their homeland, they still revere the memory of those who would have kept them free, they still feel the impulse of a united race, in which when one of its members suffer, all of the members suffer with him. And in the years of her troubled history, Poland has indeed suffered. Indeed, what nation more?

For months the contending armies, millions of men, have made a battlefield of this section of country. The presence of these armed hosts has practically stopped industry, ended farming, put a blight upon every crop, chilled the chimneys of every home. All ambition has been stifled. All sense of security has been banished. In place of domestic peace, the simple comfort of peasant homes, the sweet happiness of childhood, the pleasant reward of neighborliness after toil, in place of all these things, which make up the sum of human happiness for the great majority of us, there has come to them terror, starvation, disease, wandering, nakedness, death. Poland has been beaten and robbed in order that armies might subsist and fight. Helpless and homeless, hopeless and strengthless, this high-minded, inoffensive race has come into a period of suffering beyond anything that has ever gone before in their history.

Thousands have attempted flight, only to find that there is no refuge from the devastating storm. Hemmed in by impassable mountains and equally impassable armed camps; held in by those ties which make death, if it must come, sweeter if on one's native soil; thrust back by brutal winds and snows and senseless cannon; drawn back by baby voices, and by that home-love which flames cannot destroy; these millions of our fellow human beings are in a position of such dire want and peril as the world simply could not stand were it at peace with itself. Had the wrath of heaven and not the rage of men struck down these multitudes, all the world would have rushed to lift them up.

And as their condition becomes known, and Christian hearts begin to burn with sympathy and Christian gifts begin to pour in for the relief of Poland, lying there unheeded by the nations, who owe her life, a new chapter in the history of world charity begins to be written which promises to be perhaps, the greatest single story in all the literature of suffering. What opportunity is here presented for Christian America! It is the glory of Christianity that when it has done its utmost for those in need, it still does something more. It is not content until it has exhausted itself in service for others. And we feel, as the poignant cry from Poland comes across the world, that our leaders will charge us with failure in duty, failure in faith toward them, failure in leadership, if we fail to say with all the emphasis we can command, give us your never gave before, for your fellow beings in Poland.

The widows and orphans in that land will be the recipients of your bounty through the Christian Herald. None can possibly need it more. The whole people would say, "Widows and Orphans first." Make it possible, members of the Christian Herald Family, make it possible for our representatives there to put bread into starving mouths, clothing upon shrinking fellow beings, who but a little while ago were as you are today, all new hope and courage into hearts that have known despair of human fellowship in this world.

Send your gifts, great and small, promptly. Send them repeatedly. Send them until you simply have no more to send, and the Father who seeth in secret—the Father of them as well as of us—will understand.

Address all gifts to the Widows and Orphans Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

FROM OUR HOLLAND RELIEF COMMITTEE

YOUR secretary, Mr. Theodore Waters, has described in your paper how Holland was absolutely overwhelmed in a few days by refugees equaling almost ten per cent. of the total population of the country. A separate organization for relief to widows and orphans of the war could only be arranged after all the refugees had been properly registered, so that each case in itself could be examined. In this way only was it possible to obtain the conviction that the full benefit of your valued assistance was obtained.

Those refugees who could once more provide for themselves in Belgium have returned to their homes, but those whose houses have been destroyed and those who cannot expect to find any suitable employment in Belgium and have no means whatsoever have stayed. Naturally amongst the latter there are many widows and orphans, and these can be divided into two categories, i.e., firstly, those whose husbands and fathers have been killed in the war; secondly, those who were already widows or orphans but have been reduced to poverty by the war.

We think we are acting entirely in accordance with your intentions by extending our support to both these categories. As a matter of fact, we have rendered temporary support in such cases where no certainty could be obtained about husband or father, in other words, where the commission came across "temporary" widows or orphans who, nevertheless, were in sore need of support.

We have now circulated a letter amongst all the various local committees in Holland, established with a view to supporting Belgian refugees, and we have requested them to address to us all cases where they have found widows and orphans in need of support, at the same time giving them advice as to the best means of rendering such support. However, before giving more detailed information in this connection, we desire to be in a position to have an oversight over the whole organization, but we expect to be able to say more in the course of this month.

In the meantime, however, we have been able to do very well with your financial support. At Amsterdam, a home for Belgian children has been established. The members of this association have rendered very useful assistance in the way of making regular trips to Belgium, in order to bring children suffering badly in that country to Holland to provide a home for them in this country with families, either temporarily, while the war lasts, or permanently in the case of orphans who cannot get any support from their relations. We need scarcely say that the Union supports children regardless of religion. This association badly wanted a good building answering all hygienic requirements, where some fifty children after their arrival from Belgium could be lodged, properly fed, and medically assisted (a quarantine) in order to be taken up by relations later on. The cost of hiring and fitting out such a building, however, was beyond their means. Seeing that amongst these children there is a large number of orphans, we have decided to place at their disposal an amount of 5,000 florins ($2,000) in order to enable them to make all arrangements and, needless to say, this gift was thankfully accepted. You will therefore have the satisfaction of knowing that this very useful institution has been established solely through your assistance. The staff of the house will consist chiefly of Belgian widows.

The chairman of the above association, Mr. C. F. I. Brands of Amsterdam wrote us February 27, after his return from Belgium, as follows:

"The children I brought with me yesterday are with one exception, all orphans. They were very thin and hungry, and their clothes were in very poor condition. There was a little boy of eight years who, for want of proper boy's clothing, had been put in girl's garments and was shivering from the cold. He did not even have trousers on, and was wearing only old slippers on his feet. This was one out of a hundred cases. You see the distress is very great and will increase while the war lasts.

We trust this first report may soon be followed by others more important, but we do not wish to finish the present without a word of praise from Holland for all that America is doing to relieve the woe of the miserable victims of this dreadful war in all parts of Europe, and more especially in Belgium.

DARK LIBERIA

PERSONAL REMINISCENCES
BY JAMES R. MORRIS

THE very name of Africa has been a subject of much discussion. It is believed that the name is derived from the Latin word "aprica" (meaning sunny), or from the Greek word "aphrika" (without cold).

The nickname "Dark Continent" has lost much of its significance. The Bible long ago called Africa "Land Shadowed with Wings." Mr. Henry M. Stanley stamped it as the Dark Continent. Another name called it the Land of Blinding Sunshine. As I have traversed its jungles and pathways, many times I have called it the Land of Winding Paths. When the perspiration has flowed down over my face and body until every thread upon me has been drenched in the warm, moist climate, I have named the country "the Land of Natural Turkish Baths."

One of Africa's charms lies within the tropics than that of any other country. Its physical conformation may be compared to an upturned plate or saucer, the terraced slopes running back from the coasts and rising to its vast table-lands where countless wild animals roam and feed, and where inland native cities are built so that the report of a gun cannot be heard from one end to the other. Some of these places are stretched out that takes a man one or more days' journey to walk through them, and the often walk thirty to forty miles a day there.

The Phoenicians sent colonies there. The Greeks made conquests there. The Roman standards were also unfurled there, but this was along the Red and Mediterranean Seas. In 1788 the African Association was formed to explore inner Africa, and the father of African exploration, Mungo Park—whose career inspired Barth, Overweg, Livingstone, Stanley, DeBrazza and others, leading them to achieve a work for civilization for which humanity will ever be grateful—was sent forth.

Africa is a remarkably beautiful country. Its coast lines are picturesque, graceful, fascinating, alluring. Its seaport towns and cities are usually clean, pretty and reasonably healthful. Equatorial Africa has, until the last two decades, been called the White Man's Graveyard, but clean living, quinine, mosquito netting, sobriety and sanitary improvements have made Africa a place where one cannot only exist, but live in as much comfort, take it all in all during the year, as in the city of New York, and with some advantages in favor of Africa.

Life is simple, placid, calm, and not so complex. The work life is not strenuous. The people do not rush and drive as they do here at home. If you try to hurry a man who is working for you, he will calmly tell you, "One day be not all de days, daddy!" Any one stand rebuked, for you know he is telling you the truth.

Four and a half years ago the New York Colonization Society sent me to the west coast of Africa to study the conditions of life in America's little colored child over the sea, Liberia. It was kind of America to provide a home for her freed colored people, but cruel to leave them to the tender mercies of the big European governments to exploit and rob of thousands of miles of land, and never say, "Thank you, Liberia"; but to say, rather, "If you don't keep still about it we'll take the whole of you, and then what are you going to do about it? Your big mother over the sea is too busy looking after her own interests to bother with you. So we will loan you money and make you pay double for it; we will rob you, steal your children, put them at work in our mines and ships, and don't you dare say a word. If you do, we will eat you alive." This is what the great European nations have practically said and done. And America sleeps on.

It was what I found there, and my experience has been that of most other travelers who have had the opportunity of seeing things as they are. Morocco, Algiers, Senegal, Bathurst, Konakry, Sierra Leone, Togoland, Nigeria, Kamerun, East and South Africa are beautiful and attractive, but the little struggling republic of Liberia is to me the most attractive spot in Africa.

Monrovia, the capital city of the republic, is picturesquely situated on Cape Mesurado, and is a city with about 15,000 inhabitants, many of whom live in beautiful homes, some very costly. The cape and river were named by the Spaniards, who, in the early days of the slave trade, landed a squad of armed marines there, searching for slaves. The natives attacked them. A furious conflict took place, and the Spaniards were overcome by the bold and warlike Deys. During the battle, the Spaniards, who were beaten, cried "Misericordia! misericordia" (mercy! mercy!) So the cape came to be called Mesurado, or Montserrado, a corruption of the Spanish Misericordia.

Liberia has a number of fine settlements, peopled by either colored Americans or their descendants, who have done a remarkable work in planting farms, building homes and establishing a civilized ing match with several men, who I learn are "Revs." also. This title has a peculiar fascination for many in Africa. Everybody loves a title, and if one who has "Rev." to his name can raise $8 and send to Texas or some other place and get a "D.D.," he adds six inches to his coat-tails, and his importance and egotism grow to the proportion of a foot to the inch.

Finally our presiding elder puts his high hat and long coat on a hook, then comes to me and asks all sorts of questions about Syria. I am staggered at two of them. He asks seriously, "Brother Morris, isn't Syria way down near the southeast coast of South America?"

"Oh, no," I tell him. You just take a steamer at Monrovia, and sail north until you reach the Canary Islands, then transship from there through the Strait of Gibraltar, and go east through the Mediterranean Sea, and keep on going, and you will land at Syria or thereabouts."

"Oh!" he says.

His next question is equally staggering. "Brother Morris, do you think they have moved Syria, or is it still in the same place it was in the Bible times?" I gravely tell him that to the best of my knowledge it is still in the same place; "they have never moved it."

My interesting and talkative friend points out to me a very pleasant and comfortable house on the bank of the river, and tells me that he lives there. He gathers his string of world-weary fish, his long coat, high hat and other traps together, bids me a cordial "goodby," and leaves the boat for home and the work of presiding.

Friends meet me at the headquarters of the river, and an invitation is extended to attend a revival meeting in a little church near by at night. A serious young man was preaching from the text, "Strive to enter in at the strait gate," etc. We were late, and missed part of his eloquent sermon, but we heard him say, "What fo' you dun cum heah? Why yo' gwine cum to dis meetin'? Is yo' po' wanderin' feet in de way dat leads to distraction? Is yo' feet on de Rocks ob Ages? Whar is yo' gwine to lib fo'ebber? In de place whar de Good Book say de saints am gwine? Or is yo' gwine to be shut up in de fire an' de flames?"

"Will yo' dun gib yo'self to de Lawd, an' like dese po' mo'ners heah, seek de salvation of youse nebbah-dyin' souls?"

"Yo' mus' git all combusted togedder and seek de Lawd wif all yo'se hearts, an' bring yo' piccan [children] an' yo' frens to de Lawd. Do it one time [at once] befo' it am ebberlastin' too late."

I thought he was sound in the faith. What do you think?

One black man, having the happiest and sweetest laugh I have ever heard, comes to me, his eyes dancing with merriment, and says, "Daddy, yo' dun love me?" I answer him and say, "Yes, Monkey, I surely love you." His name is Monkey.

"Den make yo' go carry me to Kilay," he replies. How he found out that I was going to Kilay was a mystery to me. But I engaged him to "carry me to Kilay," which meant that he was to carry my belongings to Pomporah's town. Monkey went with me and was fine company, and from him I got many of my folk-lore stories which I hope to give later. Pray for him and the poor darkened souls among whom he lives.

"I Will Help Thee"

"I WILL help thee." Oh, the sweetness, oh, the sureness of his word!

Hush, O heart, be still and listen, for thy fainting cry is heard. "I will help thee." With what fleetness comes the answer back to me.

Oh, be swift to claim its surety, for his promise is to thee!

"I will help thee." Ah, no matter to what depths his help must reach,

Through what lengths, or through what mazes, it must come thy soul to teach

That his promised word once given shall forevermore abide.

Rise, O heart, be swift to greet him, for thy Lord is by thy side!

community and a decent government on the west coast of Africa. They have been greatly condemned by both Europeans and some short-sighted Americans, whose actual knowledge of Liberia could easily be printed on one single sheet of paper.

The rivers of Liberia abound with fish, and were it not for the series of fine falls or rapids, from fifteen to twenty miles back from the sea, the rivers might be navigable for hundreds of miles. The woods abound with game of many varieties—the vicious bush-cow, deer, leopards, elephants, civet cats, golden cats, monkeys in almost endless varieties, and other game. In the far interior lions and other big game abound.

About twenty tribes make their home in Liberia. Tribal wars, which depopulated certain districts, are becoming things of the past. Strange secret societies, which were at one time a menace to all, are now losing their power and hold upon the people as education and commerce are going forward. This also means a lessening of one of Africa's greatest curses—household slavery, or buying, selling, loaning or giving wives—and will diminish the numbers held by one man. I am acquainted with one man who has more than one hundred.

ON a recent trip to the hinterland, where I had been invited by King Momah, son of the powerful King Pomporah, as we sailed up the river in the little boat, with our serious friend, Solomon Hill, the owner and captain, a clerical and solemn-looking little man in a frock coat so long that it reached to the tops of his shoes, and whose collar and garb stamp him as a preacher, came to me and introduced himself as a presiding elder, having a large number of churches under him.

He asks very cordially, "What might your name be?"

"My name is Morris."

"Where you be from?"

"The United States," I answered.

"Yeh!" he replies, with a strong nasal inflection.

"What be you here for?" he asks.

"Various things," I tell him.

"I have to work very hard," he informs me, significantly.

"Do you?" I inquire.

"These people are ignorant and hard to get along with," he tells me.

"Indeed!" I reply.

"I live at Louisiana."

"Where is that?" I ask.

"On the St. Paul River." Just then everybody jumped up at the report of a gun and a heavy splash was heard as a large alligator, badly wounded, flopped into the water.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR SOULS

BY

Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D.*

Text: "Where is Abel thy brother?" Gen. 4: 9

GOD'S first question recorded in the Bible is addressed to one who has sinned against him, and is in hiding. If men only knew God, they would never try to hide from him. There is no recorded instance in the Bible and none in history where he has been other than loving to a repenting sinner, however deep his sin; and so, with infinite pathos, he is saying to Adam: "Where art thou?"

The second question which we find him asking has to do with one's brother, and thus we learn at the beginning of the story of the human family of our responsibility one for another. The questions must always stand in this order. Daniel Webster once announced that the most important question for him, and he thought for every one, was his personal responsibility to God; but I am sure that the great statesman would have agreed that the second question almost equaled the first in importance, and this is: "Where is thy brother?" for we are saved to serve.

Selfishness has no place in the Christian life. We do not pray, "My Father which art in heaven," but always, "Our Father," and he only is a consistent follower of Jesus Christ who realizes that he must seek another's welfare, and strive to make his brother's burden easier to bear, and seek to bear the lost to him. Cain and Abel were brothers. They met in the field, and Cain in a passion slew his brother, and from that day on he bore the mark of his awful sin. It is the distinguishing characteristic of sin that it always leaves its mark.

The man who is selfish, sensual, dishonest or untrue in any way, however carefully he may try to cover the fact, will show in his face, in his voice, or in his physical bearing, the fact that he is a sinner.

Cause and Effect

IF WE seek to cover sin we make a miserable failure of it. The other day a man was tried for murder. He killed his victim twenty years ago, and as they were digging for the foundation of a new building they found the skeleton of the murdered man, and easily traced the crime to the one who for a score of years had thought himself free from the claims of justice. Sin always leaves its mark and no human effort can cover it over. It is extremely sad also to realize that the mark passes on to others, and the sinful, sensual life of today touches children yet unborn.

Not long ago I spoke in a penal institution, and learned that one-half of the inmates were affected in one way or another by the sins of their parents, and they were in prison not altogether because of what they had done themselves, but, in a certain sense, because of what others had done before them. God as truly asks the question concerning our brother today as he did when he faced Cain. He has set the solitary in families, and we are supposed each to influence the other.

When William A. Sunday was associated with me in my work at the beginning of his remarkable career, I heard him speaking to a young man as we walked away from the tent towards the hotel, and calling him by name, he said: "Your mother wants you to be a Christian, for I know she is a Christian, and your father would be pleased, because he is an officer in the church." And the boy said nothing, until at last, just as they said "Good night," the boy replied to Mr. Sunday's urging, "Possibly you may not believe what I am to say, but neither my father nor my mother have ever asked me to be a Christian, and I never expect to be until they do." God has made us social beings, and we have certain responsibilities for those about us which we cannot shirk. I must not fold my arms and put forth no hand to rescue when others are drifting to eternity unsaved. I must not stop my ears when on every side the cry is heard for assistance in times of suffering, because of the pinch of poverty and because of sin, and I must not seal my lips and say no word to the unsaved about me. If I do, I shall be called to an account.

Not long ago the ex-governor of a Southern

* Dr. Chapman is America's leading interdenominational evangelist.

State was brought to Christ. He had sinned grievously, and, according to his own confession, had shocked the moral sensibilities of the people of the state and had hurt those whom he loved. A minister whom I know wrote to him and asked: "Dear Governor, why do you not accept Christ in your time of trouble?" The answer came back to him: "You are the first person in all my life who has ever asked me this question." That governor is today a Christian and a mighty force for righteousness. We are disloyal to Christ if we give no word of invitation to the unsaved about us. The same interest bring us together, and there is no Christian so humble and none so distinguished but he must, if he be true to Christ, speak a word for his Master. One of the greatest business men in Chicago was transacting a bit of business, involving an investment on his part of a quarter of a million dollars, and in the midst of the conversation he stopped and said to the gentleman with whom he was dealing, "Are you a Christian?" and then said, "Before we proceed with the other business, let us give attention to this." Such a spirit would revolutionize the whole business world.

Two hundred and fifty years ago a pedler selling books gave a pamphlet to one who was supposed to be an ordinary young man, but he was Richard Baxter, and under the influence of that pamphlet he wrote "The Saints' Everlasting Rest." This fell into the hands of Philip Doddridge, and he wrote "The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul." This book fell into the hands of Wilberforce and he wrote "A Practical View of Christianity." This book came to Leigh Richmond, and under the power of it he was led to write "The Dairyman's Daughter." This in turn fell into the hands of Thomas Chalmers, the mightiest Scotch preacher of his day, and after he became a minister, it was the means of his conversion and of his mighty spiritual transformation. A pedler on the one side and Thomas Chalmers on the other—what a marvelous story!

Why in the world should there be an apparent indifference on the part of the church people to the unsaved about us?

It is a burning shame that I should be obliged to waste one minute of my time or one ounce of my strength to try to persuade fathers and mothers to speak to their children about Christ and to impress you as Christians with the necessity of warning others who, if they should die tonight, would go into eternity unsaved!

Seeking the Lost

ONE reason why so comparatively little of this work is done in the church is found in the fact that we have grown too formal. The church is not always fitly representing her Master. There is too much of red-tape in the service she renders, and too much of formalism in her worship, and while there is no design upon the part of church members to be inconsistent, formalism inevitably breeds inconsistency. Not long ago, in the Berlin papers, there appeared the story of two people bathing in the sea, and they got beyond their depth. One man sprang to rescue them and he was pushed to death upon the rocks. The two were good swimmers and they kept afloat, but they could not reach the shore. The harbor authorities were notified, but they said it was not their business, and notified the police. They, in turn, shirked responsibility and sent word to the district authorities. For two hours the people were floating and crying for help. At last the harbor police decided to give assistance, but they had to change their clothes before they could do the work properly. Then they found that the life-saving appliances were out of order. Finally an individual sprang into the sea and battled through the waves, but when he reached the two they were insensible, and a little later they were dead.

I am aware that this is an exaggerated story when applied to the church generally, but it is a good representation of some churches I know. Suppose you should hear that a boy in the next block from your home was seriously, if not fatally, ill. The doctors had given him up, but your boy had the same disease and you knew a cure; and suppose you should not give to the stricken household the secret of your boy's cure, what would you think of yourself? Suppose you should see a blind man walking along the streets of your city, feeling his way with his cane, and unconsciously approaching a swift-running automobile or street car, and you should stand with folded arms and sealed lips and not cry out: "Danger! danger!" what would you think of yourself? And what do you suppose Christ thinks of us when we know that men are sick unto death with sin and do nothing to help? We see the multitudes rushing headlong to destruction, and we know the way of escape, and do not tell it, what can he think of us but this: that we are faithless, and almost, if not quite, heartless? It is because I would correct this if possible that I bring you this text: "Where is Abel thy brother?" It is perfectly natural to be concerned because of one's physical condition in the hour of danger.

A New York business man lived on an island, where he had his summer home. He determined to spend the late fall in his island home with his wife and children, and he and his son, leaving New York, started late in the evening to row across the Sound to the island. The boat capsized. The father could swim and the boy could not. He caught his boy by the collar and swam to the boat, but the boat turned over and he lost his hold upon the boy, and the boat was too slippery for him to keep hold of. For an hour he did his best to rescue his child. Once he got hold of his coat with his teeth, he held on, battling vigorously with his hands, but the coat tore away and the boy sank out of sight. The father barely made his way to the shore; he was a physical wreck, they say. Such a brave struggle is perfectly natural in a case of physical danger, but why in the world should there be so little concern when the danger is spiritual?

The Rebuke of the Unsaved

THERE are some conditions which must be met if we are to answer this question of the text properly. We must right ourselves. Inconsistency, worldliness and hypocrisy—these things check back the words we try to speak, but a godly life is an unanswerable argument for Christ, and a consistent life is an appeal to an unsaved person which cannot be gainsaid, nor can it be resisted.

A business man in a Southern city told me that he spent one entire day speaking to his business associates. He made seventy-five calls and was repulsed by no one.

For twenty years Edmund Tuttle was a pastor in the First Congregational Church of Meriden, Conn., and I have been told that every Friday night he wrote a letter to some man in the city. This was the letter he wrote:

"Dear friend: I am writing to ask you to attend the morning service in the First Congregational Church next Sunday. We have one of the best of pastors. Our singing is beautiful. I will be at the door to welcome you, and I shall expect you to sit in my pew. Do not disappoint me.

"Earnestly yours,
"EDMUND TUTTLE."

The pastor said he always had him in mind when he prepared his sermon, and this one man led him to Christ.

We must also realize the danger of those about us before we feel a measure of responsibility. What if we should die, and no word had been spoken by us to our household? What if our boy should die and you had never warned him? What if you were the only person in the world who could speak to him, and your lips should be sealed, and he should be lost for eternity? I feel like making the question personal: "Where is thy son? Where is thy daughter? Where is thy brother?" Where is he as regards the invitation which he may never have had?

Where is he as regards eternal life? If he does not now know Christ, if he has not been saved, if his sins have not been forgiven, then he is lost. Where is he as regards the judgment? He must meet his Judge; he must meet the record of an evil life; he must stand before his Judge; and it will be a sad thing if your son, your daughter, your wife, your wife, your brother, should say, "I was never warned; I live in a so-called Christian household and no man cared for my soul."

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D.,

REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON S. COOPER

Divine Visitations

SUNDAY, April 25. Luke 19: 44. "Thou knewest not the time of thy visitation." God visits us in opportunity. The dawn of opportunity is the unveiling of his presence. When the door opens upon the way of sacrifice and enlargement, he is there! No longer does he visit us bodily form: he comes in the form of circumstance. He speaks to us in the voice of events. We may behold his comings and goings in the movements of our day. We may see him in a tendency, we may hear him in a challenge, we may find him in the midst of upheaval and unrest. He comes to us the brightness of some glorious hope, being "clothed with light as with a garment"; and he cons to us in the shadow of some chilling disappointment, visiting us "in the night seasons."

His therefore a fine attainment in grace to be able to interpret events as to discern the presence of the Lord. We are advancing in the school of the Spirit when we know the time of his visitation, when we can look upon the robe of light or the paler darkness, and say, It is the Lord! But when we have no divine significance, when they are empty as a drum, life becomes a very hollow procession—indeed, it is scarcely a procession at all, but just a disorderly assemblage of blind and warring instincts, rushing out of the night and into the night again.

I recognize the divine visitation, and to discern the visitor! To know him as he comes! "Behold, I stand at the door and knock!" How may we know his knock? "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." "With what measure ye hear it shall be measured to you again." We need the consecrated ear and the ear is sanctified in the consecrated heart. When the heart is sanctified all the senses are awake to the presence of the Lord. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." J. H. J.

Cheerfulness Under Discipline

MONDAY, April 26. Isaiah 28: 23-29. "He will not ever be threshing it." The husbandman deals with many different sorts of plants, some of which are mentioned here. The cummin, the vetch, wheat and barley, spelt or rye. Each needs to be tilled in a special manner and at a special time. It would be absurd to thresh the vetch, or turn a cartwheel on the cummin. So it is with the human family: each individual is unlike any other and demands separate and special treatment. And so far as we can understand the secret of our existence, we must believe that the infinite variety of circumstances through which we pass is designed to correct our special faults and give us opportunities for realizing the particular beauty and glory of which we are capable. God wants to do the very best for each of us, and takes the surest and truest way to achieve it. Do not compare your lot with that of others. Do not suppose that you are worse loved because your circumstances are specially hard. Dare to believe that you are held in greater love than they, and that it is for your infinite gain that the fire for you is heated seven times. Remember that bread corn is threshed, not with a rod, but with the corn-drag, composed of heavy cylinders armed with iron teeth.

This stern discipline, however, is not pursued beyond a certain point. "He will not be ever threshing it." "He will not contend for ever, neither will he be always wroth, for the spirit would fail before him and the souls which he has made." "After two days he will revive us; on the third day he will raise us up and we shall live in his sight." The wheels of his cart and his horses may scatter you, but he will not grind you to powder. Be of good cheer—you are beloved and precious to him. Trust him! He is wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working. F. B. M.

When We Set Up Money as an Idol

TUESDAY, April 27. Mark 10: 22. "But his countenance fell at the saying and he went away sorrowful: for he was one that had great possessions." The rich young ruler who had kept all the commandments, but found his idol of riches coming between him and the Kingdom of Heaven, has been called the Hamlet of the New Testament. Like the Prince of Denmark, he stood between his conscience and his idol—ruined by indecision. There is a tradition to the effect that when the young ruler left the Master and returned home he found that the satisfaction he had felt in his possession of fields and flocks, houses and lands had gone. His talk with the great Teacher had brought him a discontent that would not be satisfied with mere "things." He finally stopped struggling against the new vision and returned, freed of his handicap, to follow the Christ.

The young ruler's idolatry did not consist in the fact that he had money, but in the fact that he had allowed money to become the supreme idol of his life. His riches had come to be the most real part of him. He took his spirit and his temper from them. Jesus saw that money had become his god, and that he could not serve God and Mammon at the same time. The Master's teaching regarding money is that wealth is an evil when it shuts out the light of better things, competing with more durable satisfactions and eternal possessions. The "deceitfulness of riches" is the false hope that money holds out, a hope that it can not and does not fulfil. To put money for itself or for oneself first, is to forget humanity as Dives did; and the man who is forgetful of his brother has cut off his chief hope of permanent happiness.

John Muir once said to Mr. Harriman, "I am richer than you are." "Yes," said Mr. Harriman, "but how?" Mr. Muir answered, "Because I've got enough money and you haven't." John Muir placed money in the right place, using it as a means solely to help him to become a great servant of his time. It is not the amount of money we have that counts; it is our attitude towards it that determines whether or not we are dollar-idolaters. C. S. C.

Feeding Daily on the Bread of Life

WEDNESDAY, April 28. John 6: 41-59. "I am the Bread of Life." Though a man may have an unlimited supply of flesh, he cannot find in it all he needs for the support of physical life. But—unless the processes used to prepare it for our consumption rob it of its original properties—bread contains all the elements needed for nutrition. So is it with Jesus. In him is stored everything needed for "life and godliness." He is a hiding-place in a storm, a covert from the tempest, rivers of water in drought, the shadow of a great rock from scorching heat. For the polluted, he is purity; for the irritable, patience; for the weak, courage; for the ignorant, wisdom. "All my capacious powers can wish, in him doth richly meet."

But bread must be appropriated before it can become life-giving. We must masticate, digest and assimilate, or we shall derive no benefit though it lies around us like the manna in the wilderness. And what the processes of digestion are to food, that devout and loving meditation on the words and work and redemption of the Lord Jesus is to our spirit. By the one process a union is secured between our bodies and the sun-energy, which is incorporated in the grain; and by the other a union is effected between our spirits and the divine-energy, which is stored in Jesus. This is where we fail. We are so fickle and irregular in our meals. We bolt our food so rapidly and carelessly. We spoil our digestion by our haste, and have to pay dearly for our fault.

Oh, to love Jesus above our chief joy, and to abide in him, and to esteem him more than our daily food! F. B. M.

The Song in the Heart Means Happiness

THURSDAY, April 29. Nehemiah 8: 10. "Neither be ye sorry; for the joy of the Lord is your strength." These are the words of Nehemiah to the weeping Jews, surrounded and harassed by their enemies. Even the new walls builded about Jerusalem could not deliver them from the fears that their foes might be too strong for them. The prophet brings them the message which has repeatedly lightened the burdened heart of humanity. It is the message that God worketh with us and that our labor therefore may be not only successful; it also may be filled with joy; it may be so joyful that others can catch from us the note of a new happiness.

"Give me," says Carlyle, "the man who sings at his work." Joy is the secret of the best effort, as it is the secret of the best health, and to make a man happier is to make him better. The Bible, in oft-repeated passages, reiterates the fact that happiness depends upon harmony with God. "The joy of the Lord is your strength." We too often connect goodness with solemnity and gloom, and associate probity with even crude and disagreeable people.

So rugged was he that we thought him just,
So churlish was he that we deemed him true.

Some one spoke of a very religious man, saying, "He is the most pious and disagreeable person I know." Religion is not complete unless it carries happiness to oneself and to others in its train. Jesus said, "Your joy shall be full," and "Your joy no man taketh from you."

What is the key to the possession of a joyous heart? A singing soul? Keep the mind fixed on "whatsoever things are lovely" and of good report. Let no one dampen the fire of your song by evil gossip. Cultivate the love that hopeth all things, the imagination of belief rather than suspicion. Keep working. Keep occupied. The man who sings in the rain is usually at his work. Keep up the regular study of God's Word; the secret of song is in "the practice of the presence of God." It is God who giveth songs in the night. C. S. C.

What "Full Surrender" Means

FRIDAY, April 30. Philippians 2: 19-30. "They all seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's." This is a very sad complaint. The apostle felt deeply that those who surrounded him in his confinement within his hired house at Rome were actuated by motives of self-interest. The flame of their apparent devotion did not burn clear. But is not this true of a good deal of the work which is being done today? We live for our church, our importance and influence, our private advancement, but how seldom is our only passion, as Zinzendorf's was, for Jesus, only Jesus.

In the life of Nicholas Herman, better known as Brother Lawrence, three steps are indicated, which led him into the blessed life, hid with Christ in God, which has stimulated so many to practice the presence of God, and in which "the things of Jesus Christ" were paramount. The essence of his teaching is that we should make a heart renunciation of everything that does not lead up to Jesus Christ. We must also make a full surrender of ourselves to him, and put our whole trust in him. All must be given for all. He must be the Alpha and Omega of our thought and activity, because everything which is worth doing, and ought to be done, may in some way be linked with him, his kingdom and his glory. It does not mean that we should think only of him. The business man doesn't think of his wife and children at every moment of his daily duties; but his heart is towards them, and their happiness and comfort are the spring and inspiration of all he does. So the underlying motive of each of us should be to do the will of Jesus and make men think well of him. F. B. M.

God Gives Assurance That Right Makes Might

SATURDAY, May 1. Luke 21: 36. "Watch ye therefore, and pray always." Luther fought his mightiest battles in all-night prayers, as Jacob did at Jabbok. Luther knew his victory was won when the morning dawned. When Ethelred was about to give battle to the Britons, seeing a number of unarmed men, he asked what they were doing. He was told, "They are praying for the success of their countrymen." "Then," said he, "they have begun the fight against us. Attack them first." Prayer moves the arm that moves all worlds, that mobilizes the innumerable hosts of heaven. He who forgets to reckon with God's legions loses the conflict. The nation whose cause is just prays with the true spirit, and often is conscious of the coming triumph. God gives assurance that right makes might. He that lacketh wisdom or might, let him ask of the Lord and it will be given him. At other times we are to stand still and see the salvation of God.

War is considered murder unless in self-defense. Those who are misinterpreting divine power find that the heavens are brass to prayer. "Thou shalt not kill" is a commandment never abrogated. Napoleon, for self and national glory, turned all Europe into a burying-ground. There were only the dead, the dying and the mourning. We have been having a similar Golgotha. The devil, as an angel of light, is the inspiration of the present conflict. As Napoleon was banished, so may other monarchs fall, who seek to build their thrones on a pyramid of human skulls. E. W. PATERSON STORMS THE BIG SUNDAY TABERNACLE. It is not too much to say that the attention of the Christian world is upon the Billy Sunday campaign now in progress in Paterson. Several things, including a phenomenal snow storm on April 3, which reduced the elaborate welcome prepared for the Sunday party to a greeting from a mere committee, seemed to chill off the enthusiasm at the start, and some were even bold enough to predict failure for the meetings. That is a word that Mr. Sunday refuses to recognize when he sees it. All the obstacles, including somewhat apathetic audiences at the start, were soon transformed by the indomitable energy of the evangelist, and the thoroughness of the organization which had been built up in Paterson to support the campaign, into a warmly responsive city. He is still a feeling that Paterson is to be a testing of Mr. Sunday and his methods. He appears to accept the challenge with unfaltering faith in his mission.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military editor staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

THE movement in regard to the prohibition of intoxicants during the war, at least, continues to excite almost as much public interest in Great Britain as the military and naval happenings of the moment. The government, while recognizing the fact that indulgence in drink is seriously impairing the efficiency of the British soldiers and workmen, and while being overwhelmed with petitions and requests for drastic action, seems to be acting, in dealing with the question, with much timidity, and the cabinet, in its weekly meeting, contrary to general expectation, did not deal with the subject, and great disappointment is, we are told, being expressed by both the British press and people at this lack of action. The opposition to appropriate action on this subject seems strongest in Scotland. Parliament will very probably occupy itself with the matter in the course of the next few days.

The submarines during the week past have continued their activity, and the total number of vessels sunk by this means has now been brought up to fifty-five. While this is a seemingly large number, it is small in comparison with the total number of vessels entering and leaving British ports during the period it has taken to achieve this result. The U-29 is admittedly lost, Berlin stating that it has been so long unheard of that it must be given up. This was the largest and latest of German submarines and was commanded by Captain Weddigen, who sank the Hogue, Aboukir and Cressy.

The government of Germany has, through the United States, made a protest to the British Government concerning the treatment by that government of the crews of sunken or captured submarines in its possession, and notified Great Britain that if anything out of the ordinary happens to these men the German Government will, for each German so treated, subject a British officer to a like treatment by way of reprisal.

In the British reply Sir Edward Grey said that the crews of the submarines could not be regarded as honorable enemies, but were "offenders against the law of nations and common humanity."

The present situation on the western battle line appears to be a waiting one, and very possibly is premonitory of an absolute change in the grand strategy of the Allies. The recent advances by the French in Champagne and by the British at Neuve Chapelle and St. Eloi seem to have proved that even a very small advance can be made only at the expense of many thousand lives.

We are only now commencing to get a clear idea of how fierce the fighting was at Neuve Chapelle and St. Eloi, March 10 to 15, when the British captured these places. Shortly after the fighting was over London reported that the German loss was about 18,000, but we had no statement of the British losses.

The London Times, up to and including the number of March 23, 1915, has published in its casualty lists the names of 755 officers who fell in this fighting, and taking the usual proportion of 20 men to one officer, we can compute the British loss at something like 15,000 to 16,000.

The cables inform us that yesterday the first list of non-commissioned officers and men appeared, and contained 1,843 names from 70 regiments—573 killed, 1,107 wounded. The total British loss in officers to March 23 is announced at 5,877, of whom

1,844 were killed. Of the 3,301 wounded, perhaps 2,000 will be able to return to the line.

On May 1, 1914, the total number of officers, including the Indian establishment, was 12,783. Unquestionably large numbers of officers rejoined the colors at the outbreak of the war, and there have also been many promotions from the ranks, so that probably the vacancies caused by these casualties have been pretty well filled.

In more than one cable during the week London has remarked significantly that the belief is held in many quarters in England that the leaders of the Allies in the West are reckoning on the very heavy cost of smashing the German line there and will very possibly seek only to hold their present positions in the belief that Russia will ultimately succeed in invading Hungary and joining hands with the allied forces working north through Galicia. To carry this plan through requires the capture of Hungary by Russia, and the opening of the Dardanelles by the Allies.

There is no doubt that Austria is the weak point in the German army, and it need occasion no surprise if a change of strategy is made, and therefore in all probability when a new attack on the Dardanelles is made will only be after the landing of a strong force on the Gallipoli Peninsula, the shores of the Gulf of Saros, near the town of Chesme, for choice, because the roads from that point reasonably good roads in nearly all directions; and at the landing of a force on the Asiatic side.

Very possibly the present operations are to afford the necessary time for such forces to be brought to the scene of operations from France and England, which countries are rumored to be sending, respectively, 100,000 and 90,000 men. It appears from the late experiences to be almost impossible for warships, unsupported by troops, to force the straits.

The Turks state that they have taken advantage of this lull to repair their forts at the entrance, new guns have been mounted therein, and to drive the mine sweepers, sinking a couple of them. If this is true the Allies have lost whatever advantage they may have gained in the recent attack.

On the extreme western end of the line there has been a little fighting around the village of Drei Graben, on the west bank of the Yser near Diksmuide, between the Germans and Belgians. The village mentioned

Right and Wrong Ideals

FRANKNESS is an excellent quality in a speaker, and when with it he combines accurate and logical statement, it is apt to create an impression. We doubt, however, whether the forty or more Presbyterian ministers who listened to an address a few days ago in New York by Professor Philip M. Brown of Princeton University were quite prepared for the wholly new angle from which the speaker discussed the attitude of the American pulpit on the war. Professor Brown used to have a chair in Robert College, Constantinople, and has been in the American diplomatic service. His field is that of international law. He bluntly criticizes the pastors for their pulpit treatment of the war. Some called it "horrible," and others "murder," but it was neither. The clergy made a mistake in dwelling too much on the propaganda of world-peace. Any sentimental, ideal propaganda for peace, he said, results in derision that hurts the whole movement of Christianity. "What are the preachers doing," he asked, "to keep the peace in Colorado, West Virginia and New York?" They should preach Christ and leave aside problems of labor and world conflicts. "God will work out his plan, and we have no right to protest against the great features of his plan." War, he declared, is not indefensible or irrational, but the most rational thing that can happen. It is not brought on by the evil in men's hearts, nor is it from malice that men in war fire at each other. Men go to war actuated by a wonderful spirit of sacrifice. He knew of men who went to war to defend an ideal; war is a conflict of ideals, and men are living or dying for ideals.

Listening to such a characterization of war, those forty ministers, who were consecrated to preach the doctrines taught by the Prince of Peace, must have wondered greatly. Could this professor, who spoke with authority, be right in holding that the ministers should either approve of the war and stop discussing peace, or leave the whole subject alone, as one outside of their proper sphere of consideration? Could any one who has studied the Gospels and who professes to follow the teachings of Jesus adopt such views? The Master dealt with the great problems that were agitating the world in his time, and those ministers doubtless recalled how we are told: He taught that enmity should give place to forgiveness; hate to love; and that "all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." Jesus made it clear that wars and persecutions were the result of sin in the world. His kingdom was not of this earth, cursed with all its wars and bickerings and bloodshed; if it were, then would his servants fight; but it was the ideal kingdom toward which all good men should strive—the kingdom of peace and brotherly love. And it is this high ideal which the church must hold up when it preaches the Gospel of the King. If the Princeton professor can find anywhere in the language of Jesus, or in the New Testament writings, a single expression in justification or approval of war, he will have made an amazing discovery. How then could he urge Christian ministers to advocate and uphold war when the very spirit and essence of Christ's teachings are against it?

That war is an evil, the effects of which will be universally felt to the end of time, Jesus himself has warned us. Wars, earthquakes, pestilences, persecutions, are to be the heritage of believers, in common with their fellow mortals. These are the inevitable accompaniments of world-wickedness. Nowhere is it promised that by means of Christianity believers are to be free from such afflictions here. Yet, through it all, they are to hold fast to their citizenship in the Kingdom of Peace, the full realization of which can only come when this earth shall have been regenerated and redeemed, and when its nations shall regard all men as of one blood and brotherhood.

The "Common People"

A TREE does not derive its strength from its flower or from its fruit. It derives its strength from its roots. And so with a nation. The nation is not fed from the top. It is not fed from the conspicuous people down. It is fed from the inconspicuous people up. What America has vindicated above all things else is that native ability has nothing to do with social origin. It is very amusing sometimes to see the airs that high society gives itself. The world could dispense with high society and never miss it. High society is for those who have stopped working and no longer have anything important to do."

These are not the words of a soap-box orator or labor organizer. They are words spoken a few days ago by the President of the United States at a Washington meeting, held in the interests of Berea College, Ky., and, more broadly, in the interests of "Appalachian America," as President Frost of Berea has named the great mountain region of the South, with its three million inhabitants. President Wilson has sounded again in this utterance the foundation truth of America's meaning and America's hope.

We are in constant danger of forgetting that a nation means only the people of the nation—and that this means not the rich, nor the prominent, but the great multitude of "common folks," of whom dear Lincoln said that the Lord must have loved them or he would not have made so many, and of whom St. Mark recorded that greatest double compliment in all literature, a compliment to the people and to the Christ: "The common people heard him gladly."

Money has power; military organizations have power; the higher learning has power. But the one irresistible power in the world is the power of the people themselves. The world is theirs. That is what America means. The common people do not exist for the purpose of making gold for a small circle of "conspicuous men"; they do not exist for the purpose of being fed to the sword or to the cannon. The people exist to help one another all over the world. They exist to find knowledge for themselves, as these constituents of Berea College have determined to find it; they exist to find for themselves opportunities of soul culture and bodily comfort; they exist for the purpose of uniting the world in one vast brotherhood, which shall hear the call of the world's ineffable Comrade and let him lead them into endless life.

Hidden Sins

IF A MAN tells a malicious lie on his neighbor, if he steals his pocketbook, if he shoots him or poisons him, if he is guilty of drunkenness, gambling, and the like—ah, then he is a great sinner, says the world. And no one will contradict the judgment of society in such a case. But what of offenses purely against God, as indifference to religion, violation of the Sabbath day, irreverent use of the divine name? In whose eyes are these things regarded as sins of darkest hue? A man may be guilty of them all his days—swear as much as he pleases, be greedy of gain, spend his Sundays in amusement or mild dissipation, never read the Bible or bend the knee in prayer, rarely if ever enter the house of God, affecting rather to look superciliously upon Christian people—one may thus live to the end and yet have the praise of a godless world as an excellent and virtuous citizen. So have men inverted the standard of moral good and evil. They have set in the front rank, not sins against God but sins against society; and these, indeed, are often the only sins to which they attach any great criminality or opprobrium. How slow we are to learn that "God seeth not as man seeth, for man looketh upon the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh upon the heart."

The Savage Standard

WHAT we are pleased to call modern civilization has strange aspects at times. Any one who witnessed the excited crowds in our cities, cheering themselves hoarse in front of the newspaper bulletins announcing the outcome of a prizefight in Havana a few days ago, might reasonably have questioned the sanity of the assembled thousands. It is doubtful whether the news of some really great event, such as might decide the fate of a nation, would have stirred up such a wild furore as this announcement of the triumph of the "white hope," who had pounded his black antagonist into unconsciousness, and won great glory for the Caucasian race. Just why there should be such exultation over the result of this brutal and ignoble exhibition is not altogether clear, since, as everybody knows, it is merely a test of brute strength and endurance, and an average healthy gorilla could easily have whipped both.

Only a few years ago pugilism seemed to be on the wane. It was said that the days of the prize-ring were well-nigh over, and that people were sick of the brutality of such exhibitions. Lately there has been a barbaric revival and the ring has again taken its place on the sporting page. It is a poor reflection on our standard of appreciation to note that there is a very large class of people the hope of whose race, be he white or black, is crowned with a halo, distinguishing him as one who possesses the animal qualities of strength and force and who can inflict the greatest punishment on a fellow man. It is the old gladiatorial arena over again where the multitudes let the savage nature loose in a way that shows that even at the best of times it lurks very closely under the skin.

An Appeal to Humanity

WE QUESTION whether there ever was a plea in the name of humanity, more eloquent and simple than that of the editors and managers of foreign journals published in the United States, who appeal to the American Government and people to stop the godless traffic in war materiel for Europe, which is prolonging the struggle and adding daily to the multitude of victims. The wadded shrapnel and cartridges our manufacturers are shipping to the combatant nations, these pet ones declare, are destined to destroy their brothers, to widow their sisters and mothers and to orphan their children. They find ample justification in this plea, if not for the sake of the soldiers themselves then in the cause of the millions of widows, the fatherless children and orphans and the serving multitudes of Europe, whose condition is being daily aggravated by keeping up the war. They believe it would soon come to an end if Americans who have been so lavishly pouring out their money to save life, could be made to fully realize what they are doing in supplying, at the same time, material to keep up the slaughter and destruction.

Among the 450 signers of the appeal are men of almost every European nationality: Italian, Slovak, Polish, Magyar, French, Jewish, Rumanian, Arabic, Syrian, Russian, Lithuanian, Hungarian, Dutch, Portuguese, Swedish, Servian, Finnish, Slovenian, Finnish, Chinese, Croatian, Polish, Greek, Rumanian, Jewish-English, Lettish, Bohemian, Flemish, Bulgarian and Norwegian. Such a document from so many different sources, representing nations on both sides of the struggle as well as neutrals, can only have been inspired by a strong desire to do what lay in their power to stop further cruel waste of human life. They know that this waste is largely the result of our traffic in war supplies. And they know that if these supplies were stopped it would be a practical impossibility, under existing conditions, to stop the slaughter. Their appeal to us to spare their brothers across the sea should not pass unheeded. We should not consent longer to have the nation's name dishonored by this inhuman traffic. As people professing Christian civilization, we cannot any longer justify the selling of deadly weapons to any of the powers engaged in this terrible struggle.

Comment by the Way

—DURING THE MONTH OF APRIL, an International Congress of Women will meet at The Hague in the interest of peace. It is expected that there will be world-wide representation. Addresses will be made in Dutch, English, French and German. Calls for the appointment of delegates to the congress have been widely issued. The call sent out by the women of the Netherlands announces that the congress will discuss a course of action for the women of the world to follow with a view to laying the hatred between nations, and to protest against continuance of the present war, as well as to plan to prevent recurrence of it in the future. The congress will urge a truce during which the combatant nations—each of which claims to be fighting in self-defense—will be asked "to publicly define the terms on which they are willing to make peace."

—NEW YORK CITY does not seem disposed to wait a war possibly two before beginning its projected revival. Judge W. A. Sunday, it is understood, is tied up by engagements until 1917, and although he was recently invited to the metropolis, the prospect of his coming is still uncertain. A large meeting of clergymen was held at the Park Avenue Presbyterian church March 22, at which the speakers favored going ahead without waiting for the evangelist. It was generally agreed that religious enthusiasm was increasing in the city, and that all the conditions were favorable for an early spiritual campaign which would probably last until 1917, if not longer. Said Sunday then come, he would be welcome.

Nutritious Straw-Flour Produced

THE experiment of human food from straw has been carried on in Germany industriously for four years by Dr. Hans Friedenthal, lecturer in the University of Berlin. The German Information Bureau announces that wholesome bread is made and used from straw, not as extreme war measure, but as a matter of practical utility. After a lecture to a meeting of the farmers' Association at Berlin, Dr. Friedenthal showed round samples of soup prepared half of straw flour, the taste of which was like green pea soup, and samples of bread, prepared of straw and rye flour, tasting very much like the Swedish rye bread. The lecturer demonstrated the high nutrition of digestible nutriment contained in oat straw, hay, pea straw, etc. He claims that straw contains four times as much albumen and from four to ten times as much fat as the potato. By thoroughly crushing and grinding all the nutritive matter of the straw can be attained so that they are even fit for baby food. Straw has always been counted on for horses, asses, cattle, swine, etc. After describing the provision of food for the royal army there follows: "Barley also is straw for the horses and breadstuffs brought they unto the place where the officers were, as man according to his hope." (1 Kings 4: 28.)

Gas Kills Trees

A MILLIONAIRE, who could not wait thirty years for trees to grow large, had thirteen fine chestnuts, full-grown, transplanted from Germantown, Pa., and set down in front of his palace on Fifth Avenue. A trench six feet deep was dug along the curb, which was filled with rich soil from a Long Island truck farm. The tons of native earth were being flung to the roots of each tree. It is estimated that the replanting cost at least $500,000. The trees were planted in the fall of 1913. They had a happy time in 1914, and this year they were dead beyond hope. On investigation the gardeners found that the Long Island soil had been saturated with illuminating gas, fatal to trees and people, and that there was also a gas leak in front of the trees that made the death more certain. Thirteen full-grown sycamores will take the place of the trees that died. Life is mental, moral and spiritual when it is attacked by the deadly fumes that poison the soul. The atmosphere of Christian companionship and of a Christian character are the certain antidotes to such stupefying deadly poisons. The godly man, with proper soil and atmosphere for his soul, is thus compared to a healthy tree: "And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper." (Ps. 1: 3.)

Spots on the Sun

THE largest spot seen on the sun for many years has just become visible. In diameter the spot seemed to be about 54,150 miles. Our whole earth could only cover a part of the affected area of the sun. The length of the group of spots, which contains, in addition to the large one, three of smaller size is about a hundred and fifty thousand miles. The largest spot of which there was a record was seen on the sun in 1858. It was 143,000 miles in diameter, covering a space larger than that occupied by the entire group that has recently been visible. Other large spots appeared in 1892 and 1893. Nearly everything has a spot on it. We are to look at the great glorious sun, and not on the black stain on it. The spots emphasize the material insignificance of our little earth as compared with the sun around which it whirls. We are ever reminded of the divine authorship of the heavenly bodies as thus recorded: "And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night: he made the stars also." (Gen. 1: 16.)

Sends Many Boys to College

MR. L. L. NUNN, a wealthy citizen of Utah, was watching the proceedings of the United States Senate from the galleries a short time before the adjournment of Congress, when his attention was attracted by the alertness of one of the pages of the Senate—Clyde S. Barley. For a page to attract attention from the galleries means more than one might think, as the dozen boys who run

RED CROSS MEMORIAL STARTED

THE cornerstone of the American Red Cross headquarters at Washington was laid by President Woodrow Wilson and the oration was made by Ex-President William Howard Taft on March 27. The building is to be a memorial to the splendid service of the women of the Civil War from both the North and South. Congress in the summer of 1913 appropriated $400,000 for this building on the condition that the Red Cross provide the additional $300,000. Almost immediately the Red Cross reported subscriptions amounting to $400,000, and the superb structure will be built at a cost of about $800,000. The building will be three stories in height, with basement and cellar, and will occupy the city block 300 x 540 feet from Seventeenth to Eighteenth Streets and from D to E Streets, Northwest. The building, which will be of marble, is of classic architecture. Massive Corinthian pillars, reaching two stories high, will encompass the structure. The Red Cross, originally intended for times of war, has been used in times of peace in relief for suffering caused by earthquakes, volcanoes, fires, floods, famines, mine explosions and other disasters. Since Congress made it a national institution in 1905, the American Red Cross has spent in peace and war $12,000,000 in cash and supplies. No truer nor tenderer women ever lived than those of the North and South during the Civil War, and they have had worthy successors to this hour. Let the memorial arise to the divine task of relieving suffering, and to the angelic womanhood which has rendered this sweet ministry of love. The building marked with the cross of Christ will reflect this tribute of his to a sanctified womanhood for generations to come: "Wherever the Gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her." (Matt. 26: 13.)

errands for senators are all dressed alike and are about of the same age, less than fourteen years old. Mr. Nunn promptly made inquiries, found that Clyde's record was good, and decided to pay his expenses for a four years' course at Cornell University. One of the senators who knows Mr. Nunn well says that he is now paying the way of nearly fifty boys at Cornell; that he has picked out the most deserving ones from different parts of the country and sent them to college at his expense. This is one of the most beautiful benevolences possible. If the man shall live a few years he will see the mental and moral interest of his investment compounded to an inconceivable amount, and the compounding process will continue throughout eternity. What a privilege, a blessing to turn money into brains, scholarship, manhood, character, supreme efficiency in the labors and duties of life! No rust can lodge on that coin, no thief can get a penny of that money. This is the kind of investment of which Christ speaks and which he rewards: "He that had received the five talents went and traded with the same, and made them other five talents." (Matt. 25: 16.)

Ancient Tomb Dug Up

RECENT excavations at an abbey at Canterbury have resulted in remarkable discoveries. A layer of earth was removed, disclosing what is assumed to be the remains of work begun by Wilfric in 1055. There now may actually be seen the despoiled tombs of Archbishops Lawrence and Justus, and part of what may be the altar of St. Gregory. There is also visible the grave in which the body of Mildred was laid by Wilfric. This excavation at Canterbury digs toward the dividing line in England between the old faith of the pagans and the new religion of Jesus. These despoiled tombs speak of the empty vanity of this earthly life. Washington Irving, in his description of a visit to Shakespeare's tomb, tells of a conversation he had with the sexton, who looked through a hole in the tomb and said he could see neither coffin nor bones, only dust. Only dust is the story of the tombs opened or closed. The tomb is more than vanity and dust; it suggests the things that do not fade and cannot die. The empty tomb in the garden is the guarantee of the resurrection of the body as well as the immortality of the soul. "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept." (1 Cor. 15: 20.)

Cement Made from Beets

IN THIS utilitarian age, little is allowed to go to waste. On the farm, in the factory, in the mine, in the slaughter-house, things that used to be thrown away as worthless are now turned into money values. The latest important discovery of the kind is a by-product recently found in the making of beet sugar. The Scientific American gives a good description of it. The scum that forms when the beets are boiled consists largely of carbonate of lime, oxygen and hydrogen, and from 70,000 tons of beets 4,000 tons of this carbonate of lime is obtained; to this 1,100 tons of clay are added, the result being 3,162 tons of good cement. The scum is put into tanks and allowed to dry partly, and then the fine clay is thoroughly mixed with it, and the amalgamated product is baked in a rotary kiln and is then pulverized into cement. There are waste forces in the mental and moral realm that should be utilized, the wasted talents, hours, opportunities, that should be turned into useful and valuable products of mind and of soul. Christ taught the lesson: "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost." (John 6: 12.)

Praying for Great Revival

REV. CHARLES WHITEFIELD WELCH and his colleagues must have felt encouraged at the general response to an invitation to a prayer and conference meeting in New York City recently. Over a hundred Protestant ministers and church officials engaged in earnest prayer for an old-fashioned outpouring of the Holy Spirit for the conviction and conversion of sinners, and the awakening of the church. Rev. Charles A. Eaton said: "If we preachers keep holding these Monday afternoon meetings long enough perhaps some of us will get religion, and I imagine that is what we are here for. We must get together and pray hard that God's mill of salvation may produce a larger grist." They agreed to hold a union communion service of ministers and church officials and that all the preachers be requested to preach on the following Sunday from this text: "Prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it." (Mal. 3: 10.)

WINIFRED STONER, A CHILD WONDER

HOW THE AVERAGE MOTHER MAY INCREASE HER CHILD'S AND HER OWN EFFICIENCY AND HAPPINESS

BY MABEL POWERS

IN NORFOLK, Va., on the 19th of August, 1902, a baby girl was born. Probably there were a great many baby girls born on that same day, but this one was a remarkable baby, for she was larger than the majority of tiny girls (weighing fourteen pounds), and she had a certain wide-awake look in her black eyes. She was the daughter of Dr. James B. Stoner of the United States Marine Hospital Service, and Winifred Sackville Stoner, writer and educator.

They say that all babies have an equal start in life, but this baby was out of the ordinary. Her mother, who had many theories, practiced them on her own child with the result that in a few years, a few weeks rather, she began to be a famous child. Many scientists and educators now declare her to be the most wonderfully developed little girl in America. The following chronological measuring points show her remarkable attainments:

- At 6 weeks, could sit alone.
- At 6 months, could talk and knew colors.
- At 8 months, could walk unassisted.
- At 1 year, used polysyllables in conversation.
- At 16 months, could read.
- At 3 years, learned musical notes and played simple airs on piano.
- At 4 years, learned Latin declensions and conjugations as singing exercises; received diploma for speaking, reading and writing Esperanto; wrote on the typewriter.
- At 5 years, wrote stories for newspapers, spoke eight languages, translated Mother Goose into Esperanto rhyme.
- At 7 years, learned the outlines of Greek, Roman and Scandinavian mythology.
- At 9 years, passed entrance examinations of one of the largest Western universities.
- At 12 years, ready for graduation work in any university in the country.

Winifred Stoner has written nine books, has taught Esperanto at Carnegie Institute, and was one of the teachers in the First Natural Education School of Pittsburg. This twelve-year-old girl plays the violin and piano well, sketches from life, is an expert chess-player, rows, skates, fences, swims, rides horseback, and can hold her own in feats of strength with the average boy of 14. She can also help mother with any household task—and loves to do so. She is a perfectly normal, childlike child, without egotism, and without self-consciousness; happy, spontaneous and loving as the day is long.

Mothers throughout the country are asking, "How has this phenomenal development been achieved, and what can I do to make my child more efficient?" Mrs. Stoner believes that the blue bird of happiness can not be caged, but must be shared with all. She knows that the more we give, the more we have, and she is giving prodigally of her time and radiant personality without thought of self to telling mothers the secret.

Mrs. Stoner calls her system natural education. By natural education she means education from the first breath to the last. Education that is practical and useful, that makes a child at home in his environment. It is playing for a purpose. All is expression, not repression. Joyous service, happiness, harmonious development of body, mind and soul.

Mrs. Stoner went back to Mother Nature to learn. She studied pedagogy with old mother cat. She observed that mother cat does not turn her children over to aunts, grandmothers, or hirelings; that she teaches them herself, and that she plays with them for a purpose. Tail-catching is the first game. It trains muscles that later will catch rats and mice, and make the kitten self-reliant. When they play they play vitally—and then lie down and rest. There is no pretension. All unconsciously old mother cat is observing these five objective points of natural education: Observation—they watch mother do it; active interest—they are intensely eager to do it; concentration—for the time being they know nothing but tail-catching; imitation—they do the way mother does; exploration—they investigate and invent new ways of tail-catching.

This wise human mother set about to apply these principles of natural education to child life, and with remarkable results. But some one says, "This is an extraordinary mother and child. All mothers have not the intelligence of Mrs. Stoner nor the splendid material to work on."

Quite true. This is an unusual woman with a trained body and mind, with the advantage of world travel and association with some of the greatest minds of the age. She has inherited splendid physical energy and endurance, and maintains them through constructive thinking and living. Her sense of humor takes her through many a hard place, and she is most unselfish in her desire to serve and help others. Not every mother could accomplish what Mrs. Stoner has, but every mother of average intelligence could make her child far more efficient—and herself, too. She does not claim that the ignorant, overworked, and half-starved mother and child can apply her principles. They must be reached in other ways. But she does claim that her child is not a genius, simply a well developed, normal child, made happy and intelligent through play directed by her mother. Things that any mother can do. Play and love are the secrets.

A PHENOMENAL MOTHER AND CHILD

Any mother who loves her child can do more with her imperfect knowledge than the hired teacher who has more knowledge, but does not love the child. All mothers who can train their children should assume the responsibility of those first years, and relieve the overcrowded conditions of the public schools. A child must have individual training to be above the average. Children can not be turned out through educational machines and be individual. Nature intended every mother to be a kindergarten teacher. It does not require any more time than the average mother spends now with her child, but let her spend it intelligently and happily, playing to a purpose. Make every task a game. It takes the drudgery out of life, and makes forty-year-old mothers look like twenty. Do everything possible to make the child interested in things worth while. Stimulate his curiosity and then satisfy it. Always answer that everlasting "why."

Begin natural education the day of a child's birth—and before. As soon as a mother knows that the fairies are to bring her a baby, every breath she draws should be one of love. We need not more children but better children. It is the mother's privilege to give her child a heritage of courage, strength, health, good cheer and love. She should prepare for this by eating pure food, drinking no stimulants, breathing and exercising much in the fresh air and, most important of all, by thinking beautiful thoughts and doing kind deeds. She should make her surroundings as beautiful as possible. We grow beautiful by looking at beautiful things with seeing eyes.

As soon as the mother is able, when baby is but a few days old, begin to play for a purpose, by training the senses, eye and ear first. "The first twelve years the mind is a sponge," says Professor James, the great psychologist. Fill it full of impressions and facts of value. It is like wax, it must be acted upon. Later the mind acts of itself, the faculties develop. The first years are the age, and ideas impressed then are not forgotten.

Most doctors would keep baby very quiet in a dark place, his three diversions being to eat and cry. Not a varied program. Mrs. Stoner says there was never a greater mistake. The first weeks and months must not be lost. It does not hurt a child to train his body, mind and soul at once. That he is not an animated vegetable to be made drunk with sleep, but a human being and must be treated as one in the beginning. When awake he must have something to do—he is intelligently amused—but don't wait for him to amuse him. Baby can't lie there at a blank wall; he must have something interesting to observe. The Indian mother hangs her pappoose on a tree, gives it a look, and lets him be lulled to sleep by nature's lullabys. We give ours a look into a fluffy carriage top.

Here are some of the suggestions offered by Mrs. Stoner for training the senses of the child in those first weeks and months, and which any mother could use. Instead of giving him a "pacifier," hang different colored bells at the foot of his crib. Attach each a different-colored ribbon. Say the name of the "bell" each time you ring one. Then name the color of the ribbon. Both eyes are being trained and baby entertained. By the time he is six months old he will pull a ribbon of any color asked for.

When four or five weeks old he should be taught definite ideas of form and motion. Get several colored balloons and tie a different one each day to his wrist. As he sits contentedly, he learns to move it in different directions, up and down and around. This starts co-ordination of mind and muscles. He is getting ideas of smoothness, lightness, color, and is also developing the strength of his baby arms. Then take two chairs, tie a string across their backs and drop a rubber ball down to baby, who is on the floor on a stack of pillows. Teach him to kick the ball, and later when he can sit up, to roll it to you. A ball is a child's natural heritage. Begin to play with it in the cradle.

Every day a mother should plan to play with her child and for some definite purpose, just as much as to provide food and clothes for him. She would spend more time and not nearly as much energy as she does now, in quieting a worrying child, scolding him, or, later, in counteracting his destructive activities. Energy must be rectified or it will be turned to destructive ends. Train the ear to musical sounds. Little babies love rhythm. If you can, sing beautiful lullabies. If not, repeat rhythmic verse. Mrs. Stoner herself, not being a singer put her child to sleep with Virgil, with the result that when Winifred was one year old she could scan the first ten lines. Many beautiful poems and songs can be learned this way.

Mrs. Stoner believes that every home should be built around the nursery. If a mother is able to have a separate room let it be the brightest, sunniest room in the house. Soft colors that are restful to the eye should be used for decoration. Hang brightly-colored reproductions of good pictures on the wall.

Make the child familiar with his environment by carrying him about the room, giving him the names of various objects and telling him simple stories about the pictures and articles in the room. He will understand much more than you think. Do not direct the attention to one thing for more than a few moments. A baby, like a grown-up, rests through change. When he ceases to be interested in things, never force them on him. Let him rest.

EDITORIAL NOTE: This is the groundwork of Mrs. Stoner's methods. As the child grows and develops its capabilities, the mother would have the child lead out the child's thoughts along pleasant lines. Much that has been found difficult to learn in school book form, Winifred learned as simple jingles similar to the familiar to most children by which the months of the year are memorized. Wide-awake mothers will find many aids to the command, and in no department of the child's education these aids better prepared or more easily utilized than in relation to the child's moral nature. Once the inertia of letting children grow up just like all other children has been overcome by a determination to give one's child the best opportunity possible, mothers will find that the way is far easier and more pleasant than they have supposed. This is the great value of Mrs. Stoner's wonderful success. It is, of course, a hard experience, but between it and the ordinary routine of life what vast room there is for improvement!

THE WORLD-WAR ON ALCOHOL

EUROPE AND AMERICA IN RIVALRY FOR NATIONAL PROHIBITION AND THE DESTRUCTION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC

BY FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

THE great war has not only thrown the nations into loud lamentation for the loss of the bread in almost every home, and their knees in a cry to God for help, but it is wounding and possibly destroying the liquor traffic in a way that is never dreamed of when the conflict began. Perhaps the most significant event in the warfare against drink since the world began is the national prohibition of intoxicants in Russia, with almost twice as many people as we have in our country, and this was done by imperial edict and the authority of the Duma in a year. There was grain enough for bread, vodka, but not for both; so, as a war measure, determined to have bread for the soldiers and the people, and let the vodka go. The time of the edict, Russia was using 2,000,000 gallons of spirituous liquors which was almost twice as much as any other nation on the globe, and now the United States having the distinction being second to her.

Fortunately, there is a cause deeper than the physical efficiency back of the abstinence of the nation's drink. It is a deep-seated, conscientious conviction of the people that vodka was a sin and crime against God and man, and its removal on moral and religious grounds was necessary. One of the greatest moral figures in the history of the world is Michael D. Rebuff, who was a poor peasant, educated and possessing an intense faith in God and for Christ his Saviour. He grew rich, and a tenant on his farms, an excellent man, inebriated, crazed by vodka, murdered his wife. The tragedy so affected Mr. Rebuff that he swore eternal vengeance against vodka, and determined to live his life to its destruction. As mayor of the city and member of the Duma, he used his ability and statesmanship in behalf of restrictive measures against alcohol, in which, however, he was defeated by the bureaucracy. When he broke out this patriot and renounced an audience with the czar, and by his personal influence brought about, first, the temporary expulsion of vodka and then abstinence and that of all intoxicants in the war period. He says that the czar promised him that national prohibition should continue after the war.

Before the war, the German emperor took a bold stand against the excessive use of intoxicants, and said that drinking habit of Germany was doing injury to every way. He recommended total abstinence to the students, the officers of his navy and others. In addressing young naval officers he said: "I want men in my navy who can keep their ships straight. If you use liquor, you can not steer them straight. I want men to aim my ships in such a way that they will hit the enemy. I want men to sink it in a vital place and sink it. You can sink beer, you can not aim my ships to hit the ships of the enemy. I would advise you to take a pledge of total abstinence from drink." As a war measure, it has materially repressed the future, sale and use of intoxicants.

One of the most economical and shrewdest nations of the world, as a war measure, early in the war abolished abstinence.

The chancellor of the British empire, David Lloyd-George, surprised the nation and the world by his arraignment of drink and its influence on the men building ships and munitions of war. He said, among other things: "We are in Germany, Austria and drink. It is the worst of our enemies! It does us more harm than all the submarines of Germany put together." King George V showed himself strongly in favor of the moral and economic reform in the following letter addressed by him through his private secretary, Lord Stamfordham, to the chancellor of the exchequer:

From this evidence, it is without doubt largely due to drink that we are unable to secure the output of war material indispensable to meet the requirements of the army in the field, and that there has been such serious delay, in consequence, of the necessary reinforcements of supplies to aid our gallant troops at the front. A continuance of such a state of things must inevitably result in the prolongation of the horrors and burdens of this terrible war. I am instructed to add that if it be deemed advisable, the king will be prepared to set an example by giving up all alcoholic liquor himself, and by issuing orders against its consumption in the royal households, so that no difference shall be made, so far as His Majesty is concerned, between not believe the Czar would veto such a bill now.

ICELAND, a few years ago, started toward national prohibition. It has it in full effect this year, and Denmark, which gave her official sanction, is pleased at the experiment. Iceland has a poor soil and climate, but it has no almshouses, nor inmates in jails, nor criminal courts worth mentioning; but it has newspapers, schools, churches, total abstinence for the individual, and prohibition for the nation.

Going 17,000 miles south, we find New Zealand with the same hatred of rum they have in Iceland and with a fight on, almost as victorious. The people voted the liquor traffic out by a majority vote; but their law required a sixty per cent. vote, which they will secure in the near future.

Canada has local option, and by it gained the victory in September last with a majority of 35,000, and with every city but three voting against license. It was followed on election day in last November by the four Western states of Arizona, Colorado, Oregon and Washington, all adopting constitutional prohibition.

ALABAMA, the only Southern state to return to license, slipped back into the prohibition column in January, and Arkansas, Iowa and Idaho adopted prohibition in February. Both branches of the legislature of Utah passed a state-wide prohibition bill in March; but the governor vetoed it some time after the legislature had adjourned (an act of questionable legality), and there was no recourse. On one day, the third of last November, the saloon was cleared away from enough space in United States territory to make room for England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales; for all of Italy, Holland, Switzerland and Denmark, and then have enough left for another England. Within the last eight months a geographical area has been cleared of the liquor traffic in this country into which could be placed the British Isles, all of France, all of Germany, all of Italy, all of Denmark, with five thousand square miles left.

What an empire—with the Stars and Stripes, unstained by rum, and the Cross of Christ as the sources of the best civilization on the earth! We have here a hundred years of progress in a little over half a year in the warfare against alcohol.

In February last the legislature of South Carolina voted to submit the question of state-wide prohibition to a vote of the people next September. In the same month, the legislatures of Montana and South Dakota passed a similar bill, sending the question of prohibition down to the people to be voted upon in the November election of 1916. In February the Vermont legislature also voted to refer a statutory prohibition measure to the people for approval. On February 25, Minnesota passed a county option bill, to take effect immediately, which was fought bitterly by the liquor people.

For between forty and fifty years the brewers and distillers have had a strong hand on municipal, state and national legislation, corrupting it with its touch. The more than $200,000,000 tax paid by these men gave them a real mortgage on national affairs; but things have changed miraculously. Little by little the United States Government has resented the assumed ownership by removing bars from government buildings and institutions, by taking the canteen out of the army, grog from the men in the navy, the wine-mess from the officers, under Secretary Daniels, and the saloons from the Canal Zone under the present administration. The grip of the brewers and distillers on Congress was so absolute that it took ten hard years of fighting to get a vote on the Interstate Amendment Commerce Bill, forbidding the illicit transfer of liquors from "wet" to "dry" territory, which was passed by a two-thirds majority over President Taft's veto and has recently come into effect to destroy, according to the admission of the liquor people themselves, one-third of all their business in America!

For the first time in one hundred and thirty-eight years a vote on a bill for national prohibition was allowed to come to a vote on December 22. The measure was prepared by the Anti-Saloon League, concurred in by the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and endorsed by about all of the temperance organizations in the country. The bill had been introduced by Senator Morris Shepard of Texas into the Senate, and into the House tween the treatment of the rich and the poor in this question.

On April 6, the following order was issued by the king's command: "No wines or spirits will be consumed in any of His Majesty's houses after today." Lord Kitchener has also taken the same pledge of abstinence for himself and his family during the war.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, in his Easter sermon, made a powerful and eloquent plea for total abstinence and national prohibition during the period of the war. Many prominent men and statesmen, as well as many of the workmen who have heretofore used liquor, have followed the example of the king in his abstinence from drink. There is a difference of opinion as to what measure the government should adopt. Some think it should go as far as Russia, and demand national prohibition; others think less drastic measures should be adopted; but all agree that spirituous liquors should be suppressed, and other repressive policies employed.

THE Scandinavian countries have been pioneers in the war on rum. There are 500,000 total abstainers in Sweden, which has only six million inhabitants. The Parliament of Finland, within the last few years, passed a nation-wide prohibitory law, which was vetoed by the Russian Czar under the evil spell of his bureaucracy. We do much "dry" territory has been secured. The rural districts generally have adopted total prohibition. Prince Edward Island is entirely "dry."

It is generally agreed that the steady, persistent, successful warfare of the people of the United States on the liquor traffic has had much to do with giving temperance light to Europe and the world, and has been the leaven which is leavening the whole lump. About sixty years ago, a wave of prohibition swept over the Northern States. Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Delaware, Michigan, Indiana, and Iowa adopted statutory prohibition. One state after another dropped out of the line, until in 1907, Maine stood solitary and alone. In 1907, Maine, Kansas and North Dakota were the only ones of the eighteen states that had tried the experiment of prohibition that retained it, they having adopted constitutional prohibition. Then a wave of popular indignation set in which has moved with steady but merciless fury against the saloon and which now seems to have reached its climax in the process of the destruction of the drink traffic. The states have entered the prohibition column in the following order: Georgia in 1907; Oklahoma, Alabama, Mississippi and North Carolina in 1908; Tennessee in 1909, and West Virginia in 1912. Since last September, the number of "dry" states has been doubled. Virginia be-

UNITED STATES ASSERTS RIGHTS ON SEA. The latest note from Washington to the British and French Governments on the subject of rights of neutrals as affected by the reprisal policy of those governments in the matter of the German submarine blockade, was made public on April 5, and was found to be a dignified, firm and friendly assertion of the right of American merchantmen to pass unmolested through a blockading cordon to neutral ports, provided their cargoes consisted of non-contraband goods. The note expresses the expectation that England will modify her newly made policy sufficiently to avoid any interference with United States trade, and will be prepared to make full reparation for any injuries inflicted on American commerce through violation of our neutral rights. The possibility of a new form of blockade through use of submarines and aircraft is recognized, as also the right of a belligerent nation to visit and search neutral ships which may with reason be suspected of carrying contraband of war intended for the enemy, and to take such ships if caught with contraband on board to a prize court for disposition. Positive protest is made against the right of a belligerent country to include in a naval blockade the coasts and ports of a neutral power, as was done in the British Order in Council. Comments of the British press upon the note reflect virtual agreement with its views, and forecast compliance on the part of the Allies, inasmuch as the laws and precedents cited in the note establish a clear case for the contention of the United States Government.

TWO NOTABLE CAREERS ENDED. On April 6 Curtis Guild, former governor of Massachusetts and United States ambassador to Russia, died at Boston, aged 55. Mr. Guild came of Revolutionary stock and was a son of whom Massachusetts has always been proud. He served in the Spanish War, was three times governor of the state, was an ambassador to Mexico and also to Russia, and as the owner and publisher of the Commercial Bulletin and a man of high literary attainments made his impression upon current public affairs. His father, Curtis Guild, was also the editor and proprietor of the Bulletin, and the son worked his way up from the position of a reporter until he had mastered the business of which he was in turn the proprietor when he died. On April 7 at New York, F. Hopkinson Smith, widely known as an author and less widely known though equally proficient as an artist and engineer, died in his seventy-seventh year. Mr. Smith was born in Baltimore, and through business reverses sustained by his father he became a shipping clerk in a hardware store at fifty dollars a year at the age of sixteen. He had a strenuous struggle before achieving success, the construction of the foundation for the Statue of Liberty in New York Bay being one of his works as an engineer. He did not begin writing until he was forty-five years of age, although he had always been skilful at drawing, and was known worldwide at the time of his death.

KILLED BUT NOT DEAD. The United States Department of Agriculture has announced that the foot-and-mouth livestock scourge has been eradicated, but that more animals inevitably will be stricken because all possible means of conveying the infection have not been destroyed. However, all infected animals known to the department had been killed and buried at the time the report was made, more than 124,000 between October and the end of March. The financial loss to the industry has been enormous. The government has spent in the neighborhood of three million dollars to stamp out the plague and reimburse owners fifty per cent. of the value of the animals slaughtered, the states in most cases paying the other fifty per cent., and it is estimated that the value of the animals killed approximated six million dollars. It is now believed that if new cases are promptly reported, future spread of the disease can be wholly prevented.

TOP-NOTCH DAYS AT THE STOCK EXCHANGE. Only twice since 1912 has the Stock Exchange at New York reached the record of a million shares in one day, except the two panic days which preceded the closing of the Exchange last summer at the outbreak of the European War. But on Friday, April 9, 1,275,000 shares changed hands. Two hundred and forty thousand of these were due to trading in steel. Other standard securities took a big advance, among them Amalgamated Copper, Canadian Pacific, Lehigh Valley, Northern Pacific, Reading, South Pacific, Union Pacific. The United States and the Bethlehem Steel Companies were the leaders in the day's advance. United States Steel advancing 7½ points, Bethlehem Steel 7 points. The advance in Bethlehem steel has been most remarkable, the stock rising from 67¼ to 112 in two weeks. As has been pointed out in previous statements, this spectacular advance in steel stock is due to large orders remaining unfulfilled for guns and ammunition to be shipped to the nations at war in Europe.

DO WE REALLY REPEAT OURSELVES? Does our civilization—in any of its phases—advance in a straight line or swing around in vast circles, constantly repeating itself? This is an old problem which has been strangely recalled by not a few of the archeological discoveries of recent years. We find that, to a considerable extent, we are treading in the footsteps of our ancestors, and that there is somehow, somewhere, a gamut of human effort, which is oft repeated and beyond which we do not seem to go very far. Professor Camden Coburn, archeologist and explorer, who has spent many years in Palestine, Egypt, and other ancient lands, tells us of a few discoveries he has made which, though belonging to remote periods, have a distinctly modern flavor. Thus he has evidence, he declares, which shows that Rome had seventy labor unions in Paul's time, and capital and labor were waging war against each other; that there were big trusts and monopolies in oil, eggs, bricks and various other articles; an income tax was levied on all Roman incomes over $4,000; Nero's palace had three elevators; that there were three systems of shorthand two thousand years ago, and stenographers a-plenty; that 3,000 years ago, hobble skirts were worn by the fashionable ladies of Eastern lands; that there were "sure cures" for baldness, and professionals who practiced mental healing or thought cure. The fact of the existence of those early phases is beyond doubt, the professor says. They are referred to in well-preserved papyrus descriptions and on clay tablets. One interesting phase, which might stir the jealousy of some of our latter-day plutocrats, is the case of a noble Roman—a patron of the arts—who spent $12,000,000 in decorating his house. Another ITEMS IN BRIEF. In a battle at Irapuato, Mexico, on April 8, General Obregon routed the forces of General V. the latter losing 3,000 killed and wounded.—The well-known firm of J. B. Greenhut & Co., controlling big department stores in New York, went into a receiver's hands in a suit on April 9. Liabilities nominally estimated at $18,000,000; $17,000,000. There are some hopes of a reorganization.

THE EITEL BECOMES OUR GUEST. After spending whole country in suspense for a week—not to mention British and French cruisers waiting outside the harbor—warming expectation to the top of the thermometer for a dash for freedom, the German converted cruiser Eitel, Friedrich froze everybody into disappointment quietly becoming interned 12 o'clock midnight, until the end of the war, the reason given by Commander Thierichens being that in the face of expected relief he was unwilling "to deliver ship to fruitless and certain destruction." It is the quintessence of neutrality, the United States authorities detained at Newport News several merchant ships, British and Russian, that were recalled inasmuch as their departure would have necessitated the Eitel's remaining in port twenty-hours thereafter willy-nilly. The masters of these ships refused to see the humor of the situation. In case of our other involuntary guest, the Odenwald, which was prevented from leaving San Juan without clearance papers by shots from the American fort, the German Government has charged at United States officials in Porto Rico disregarded international rules in withholding clearance papers, and an investigation by our government has been set on foot is now under way.

WAR CORRESPONDENT RECEIVES REWARD. In the course of an interview with the Sultan of Turkey at Constantinople April 7, in which the arch refused to imagine that the Dardanelles campaign, taken, the service that luck played in the latter suggested by the representative of the Associated Press and he was rewarded by the information that the Turks have this saying: "Luck is infatigable with efficient."

FROM PALACE TO COTTAGE. A big new bill before the New York legislature favored Governor Whitman which, if passed, will result in the abandonment of Sing Sing Prison for a new one to be built in Dutchess County and to be called Winthrop Prison, and, if Warden Osborne has his way, the cage system will be adopted.

HER "S. O. S." UNAVAILING. Although the steamers picked up the wireless call for help sent by the Royal Dutch West Indies steamship Prins Maurits, apparently sixty miles northeast of Cape Fear, were unable to find the vessel after a long search, no doubt remains that she went down, trying crew and four passengers, 49 in all, to death. Prins Maurits sailed from New York for Port-au-Prince, Haiti, April 1, and disappeared April 4. That same day a terrific storm drove a tug, the going tug, the Edward Lauterbach, and a towed the Virginia coast, 15 men being lost; and off the Delaware coast 10 men perished when their coal barge foundered. There were other disasters all along the coast, but with no loss of life.

A COLORLESS FUTURE. The textile industry confronted with the possibility of shutting down within sixty or seventy days, throwing nearly half a million workmen out of employment, because of the impossibility to import dyestuffs from Germany, that situation being due to two causes: the blockade of German ports, and the use by the German government of basic elements of dyestuffs in the manufacture of explosives. Textile manufacturers of twenty-eight states made representations to the government at Washington on the subject, and declared that experiments in this country failed to discover a formula for making dyestuffs that could be utilized within a half dozen years.

A DISTINGUISHED UNDESIRABLE CITIZEN. Dr. G. Pinchot, who was attached to the American Legation at The Hague, and, as a member of the commission for the investigation of the German lines, has been expelled from Belgium by the German authorities because his wife of an Englishman, Sir Alan Johnstone, British minister at The Hague, this relationship throwing Mr. Pinchot out of the society of the British minister in the opinion of the German government, General von Blissing, and Mr. Pinchot turned to Holland March 31, where he waits instructions from Washington. The fact that Mr. Pinchot had been appointed our minister to the Netherlands, Henry van Dyke, acting American consular agent, made him (because of his connection) persona non grata to the German authorities.

HUMAN BLOOD A GOOD FERTILIZER. The price of the common stock of the Bethlehem Steel Company has been greatly stimulated by the demand for materials by belligerent nations in Europe, that huge corporation with many subsidiary companies being one of the heaviest producers of ordnance and other supplies. On April 8 the Bethlehem stock created great excitement on the Exchange, going up 105 to 117 and making a net gain for the day of 12½. This spurt was attributed to various causes, chief of which was the company's reputed big contracts from Europe.

THE PRESIDENT ON THE WAR

PRESIDENT WILSON is in his happiest vein when he is on his feet, with an intelligent and responsive audience in front of him. His brief talk to the Maryland Annual Methodist Protestant Conference in Washington, a few days ago, is worth more than a passing paragraph. "These are days of very great perplexity," he told the ministers, "when a great cloud of trouble hangs and broods over the greater part of the world. It seems as if great, blind material forces had been released, which had for long been held in leash and restraint. And yet, underneath that you can see the strong impulses of great ideals."

"It would be impossible for men to go through what men are going through on the battlefields of Europe—to go through the present dark night of their terrible struggle—if it were not that they saw, or thought that they saw, the broadening of light where the morning sun should come up, and believed that they were standing, each on his side of the contest, for some eternal principle of right."

"Then, all about them, all about us, there sits the silent, waiting tribunal which is going to utter the ultimate judgment upon this struggle, the great tribunal of the opinion of the world, and I fancy I see, I hope that I see, I pray that it may be that I do truly see great spiritual forces lying waiting for the outcome of this thing to assert themselves, and asserting themselves even now, to enlighten our judgment and steady our spirits. No man is wise enough to pronounce judgment, but we can all hold our spirits in readiness to accept the truth when it dawns on us and is revealed to us in the outcome of this titanic struggle."

"You will see that it is only in such general terms that one can speak in the midst of a confused world, because, as I have already said, no man has the key to this confusion, no man can see the outcome, but every man can keep his own spirit prepared to contribute to the net result when the outcome displays itself."

The President, in these thoughtful terms, pictured the open mind—the right attitude for Americans. There are, unfortunately, too many who keep thrashing around to find a solution for what is clearly an insoluble problem—thus far at least. Let us possess our souls in patience, and wait for the light which will surely come.

got rid of $90,000,000 in one year, but the method this Cæsar used in his extravagance is not stated.

TWO EMINENT SCHOLARS DIED ON APRIL 9. Professor Thomas Raynesford Lounsbury of Yale, and Professor Friedrich August Johannes Loeffler of the University of Berlin. Professor Lounsbury was recognized as a great English scholar and especially as an authority on Shakespeare. He was the author of many books of literary and critical studies. He said on one occasion that if cast ashore on a desert island and limited to five English books he would choose Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, Tennyson and the Bible. Professor Loeffler was famous as the discoverer of the diphtheria bacillus. The development of the diphtheria antitoxin was largely the result of his work. Dr. William Hallowell Park of New York, an authority on bacteriology, said of Professor Loeffler: "I place him just after Koch and Pasteur in the importance of his work." Dr. Loeffler was also successful in finding preventives for certain diseases among animals, particularly the foot-and-mouth disease, for which he discovered a preventive inoculation in 1899. He was the author of many works on disinfection, milk-hygiene, sewage disposal and various phases of bacteriology. He was a privy counselor and a member of the German Imperial Council of Health.

Questions and Answers

W. W. Barbourville, W. Va., writes: "As we have had such unusual weather this winter (the thermometer ranging down around zero, and the absence of wind), do you believe the European war has had any effect upon our climate?" Professor Samuel Phelps Leland, the well-known astronomer, to whom we have referred the foregoing letter, writes in reply: "It is difficult in the present state of climatic knowledge to state definitely what influence the tremendous cannonading in Europe may have had on our atmosphere. The vibrations are so intense that their waves may reach us, and, perhaps even envelop the earth. It is a familiar knowledge that any disturbance of the atmospheric currents will affect the temperature. Our atmosphere, at the height of only a few miles above the earth, is very rare, and vibrations or solar waves can be carried very rapidly and over great distances, meeting, as they would, with very slight resistance. They may form whirlpools or gaseous cyclones in the far-away skies, directly affecting the condition of the denser atmosphere below. It is, therefore, not improbable that the temperature of the whole earth should be affected, with a tendency to whirlwinds and cyclones, especially in mountainous districts."

ader, S. C. 1. Forgiveness is a Christian privilege as well as a duty. It is the exercise of grace that strengthens our own Christian character, while influencing that of the person to whom it is extended. Ordinarily speaking its effect would be to soften the asperity of feelings toward us; but we should regard forgiveness as the right course, whether the beneficiary appreciates it or not. Even if the offense should be repeated, we must still forgive. Jesus himself said we should forgive our brother "seventy times seven." (See Matt. 18: 22). 2. Gambling should not appear in a Christian's record of things permissible. There are plenty of innocent games that are wholesome and entertaining without the gambling element. For those of others whom we might lead into sin through our example, we should avoid even the appearance of evil.

Edirb, Goodman, Miss. 1. The English translators who made the Authorized Version use the word "Lord" as the equivalent of several Hebrew and Greek words, some of which have a different import from others. "Lord" is an old Saxon word, meaning "ruler" or "governor." The translators applied this interpretation to the Hebrew word "Jehovah" in many places, and also to the Greek equivalent of the word. There are many eminent scholars who have regretted this choice as not sufficiently distinctive, since in the Hebrew Scriptures the word "Jehovah" is never used with reference to God, but the Almighty, whereas the word "Lord" is sometimes applied to the Supreme Deity and sometimes to an earthly ruler, or even an emperor. 2. The Revised Version, although accepted almost universally by scholars, and valued for reason of its greater accuracy, has never been held upon the affections of the common people which the Authorized enjoys.

F. S., Miguel, Calif. We must not judge of people, especially on general principles, and where we do not know the facts. There are many people who, while not professing Christianity, are yet full of sympathy for those in suffering. Kindness and generous helpfulness are prominent features of Christ's teachings here on earth. He taught his followers to love one another, and to cultivate the spirit of kindness to all who came within their influence and who needed help. He regarded any kindness shown to the needy, the sick, the prisoners, the destitute as done to himself, and, equally, any indifference shown to the sufferers he condemned in the words "Inasmuch as ye have not done it to the least of these, ye did it not unto me." There was nothing in his language to convey the lesson that kindness was to be confined exclusively to those who were of the faith. His own love and pity went out to the whole world. When the case is that of a believing brother who needs our help, such a one has a double claim upon our practical sympathy, as being a member of the household of Christ.

Reader, Wales, Ontario, Canada. The United States as a nation owes England as a nation no money. United States bonds are held by England for investment purposes, but they are held by individual investors. Doubtless there are many British consols held on this side of the water by our own American investors. (The word "consols" is an abbreviation for "consolidated annuities.") England cannot approach this country for anything that America owes England. Indeed, the situation is rapidly becoming the very reverse of this. At the outbreak of the present war, there were $81,000,000 in maturing New York City bonds held by British investors, and every dollar of this indebtedness was paid off several days in advance of its maturity, by gold being shipped into Ottawa, and a good, stiff premium of exchange was paid. Not only does the United States as a nation owe England as a nation nothing in the way of gold, but the balance of credit is in our favor and is rapidly being augmented.

C. H. R., Otisville, Mich. 1. There is no record of New York ever having been "dry," in half a century at least. On repeated occasions the saloons have been subjected to more or less rigid supervision and compelled to close at certain hours. Numbers of the lowest class of drinking places have been wiped out by the cancellation of licenses or the refusal of renewal. 2. Your second question is purely speculative and cannot be definitely answered.

Reader, New York, writes: "What was done in Congress with the Gallivan Bill, which was designed to prevent the passage through the mails of any newspapers and periodicals that dared to criticize the Church of Rome?" The Gallivan Bill was not reported upon by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, before which it had a public hearing on February 1, an account of which appeared in the Christian Herald on March 3. It was a foolish attempt at curbing the freedom of the press, which could only have originated in minds blinded by bigotry and prejudice, and utterly unable to comprehend the American spirit, which would never tolerate legislation of the kind proposed.

E. R. K., DuBois, Pa. The question of church entertainments is one that deserves serious consideration. The Lord's house was not consecrated to his service for the purpose of being turned over to worldly amusements such as you mention, including dances and secular games, the singing of popular songs, etc. If a church is to fulfill its mission, its leaders should be spiritually-minded men who can find some better use for it than to try to set up a rivalry in worldly pleasures. If they make it a matter of conscience and prayer, they need have little difficulty in deciding where to draw the line. We do not consider lectures or concerts out of place on week days in a church, provided they be of the right kind, and church socials are conducive to the cultivation of neighborly spirit among the members.

Edith M. L., Somerville, N. J. 1. No doubt Sir Henry Howard, the British envoy to the Vatican—the first representative from England appointed in three hundred years to the Holy See—had to go through the regular formula at his presentation to the Pope that is customary in such cases. His appointment was strongly opposed by the Protestant societies of England; but their opposition was unavailing. 2. We know nothing about the organization you mention beyond what has appeared in the public prints. 3. For a description of Polaris, the North Star, turn to the article on "Astronomy" in any good encyclopedia.

C. W., Grinnell, Ill. Luke the evangelist and author of the book of Acts, though not an apostle, has so well supplemented their labors by his New Testament writings that he has put the whole Christian world under loving obligations. The profession of medicine in Luke's day was regarded as suited to persons of humble rank, and was frequently practiced by slaves. About Luke himself and his antecedents very little is known. He was not born a Hebrew, and the date of his conversion is nowhere stated. That he was a physician Paul testified in his Epistle to the Colossians 4: 14. Tradition says he was born of Gentile parents in Antioch. 2. The profession of medicine is very ancient. Early writers state that it was practiced with great skill in Egypt, Chaldea and Babylonia.

Reader, R. F. D., No. 4, Putnam, Conn. If the prize you mention is offered to the customer who purchases the largest amount of goods at the store, this would not constitute gambling. But if numbered tickets are given out and the prize is to be given to the one holding a certain number, this is gambling, or lottery, because the reward comes by chance, and the chances are paid for.

Mrs. I. T., Arapahoe, Okla. 1. The passage in Gen. 1: 26, "Let us make man in our image," is the first use in Scripture of this plural pronoun. It is the pluralis majestatis, the majestic form of utterance that belongs to royalty and which has been adopted by the monarchs of earth when they desire to be especially authoritative and impressive. But the human mind cannot grasp fully the significance of the plural form in this instance, beyond accepting it as the first intimation of the great mystery of the Godhead which was further made known in the revelations of the Gospel. Some have held the passage to be part of a soliloquy in which the Creator gave his thoughts to the writer through inspiration, while others claim that the Creator may have been addressing the angelic hosts whose agency was to be employed to carry out his sovereign purpose. 2. Melchizedek, who is introduced in Gen. 14, has been, through all the ages, a personality of mystery. Some Jewish traditions have identified him with Shem; others held that he was an angel in the flesh, and still others that he was an early manifestation of the Son. That he was a type of Christ is generally accepted, and this view is supported by Ps. 110 (one of the strongly Messianic psalms), and also by Heb. 7. The subject is treated at considerable length in the book "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered."

H. P., Edinboro, Pa. 1. Palestine, at this writing, is still nominally under Turkish rule. 2. The passage in Luke 21: 34 has been a subject of much controversy by prophetic writers and not all are agreed concerning it. 3. Mr. Redding's book is enlightening. Written fifteen years ago, it is especially interesting from the fact that it foretold the present war. Published by Loomis, Peckskill, N. Y. For your other questions, which are too far-reaching to be discussed in the Mail-Bag's limited space, see any good Biblical encyclopedia, preferably Schaff-Herzog or McClintock and Strong.

Miscellaneous

M. F. C., Keene, N. H. Commentators are practically agreed that the passages to which you refer, in Zech. 12: 10; John 19: 37; 13: 18; Ps. 49, have direct reference to the sufferings of Christ, and in some cases to the ultimate repentance of the Jews.

Mrs. J. W. B., Carlisle, Pa. There are many birds mentioned in the Bible from the sparrow to the eagle, the turtle-dove to the vulture. McClintock and Strong enumerate a partial list of thirteen clean and twelve unclean birds mentioned in Scripture. Harbaugh's Birds of the Bible is a good authority on the subject.

Mrs. J. J. J., Venedocia, Ohio. Candlemas, in the Roman Church, is the feast of the purification of the Virgin, held on February 2. The name "Candlemas" is derived from the introduction of candles in the procession on that day, all the candles and tapers being "consecrated," including also a supply to be used in the churches during the whole year. The Church of England abandoned the festival of Candlemas long ago.

D. S. Van H., Amsterdam, N. Y. The case to which you refer is probably that of the Christian missionaries in Korea, who were accused by the Japanese authorities in that country of having incited rebellion among the natives. The case was dealt with at considerable length in the Christian Herald. There was an official investigation which did not sustain the charges, although the missionaries were subjected to much hardship and inconvenience at the time.

In a recent issue the Christian Herald published a short article relative to the experiences of William Durst of Philadelphia, who was spoken of by the writer of that article as "the last survivor of the Monitor." Commodore S. C. Van Tassel of the National Association of Naval Veterans writes us enclosing the names of four other survivors of the Monitor. They are William E. Carpenter, St. Louis, Mo.; John Driscoll, Hampton, Va.; Lawrence F. Fay, Indianapolis, Ind.; and George W. Weeks, Washington, D. C.

E. C. S., Maysville, N. C. 1. The familiar language of the time of Jesus' ministry, and of the people among whom he lived and taught, was the Aramaean, one of the northern branches of the Syro-Arabian family of tongues. It has been sometimes called the Syro-Chaldaic, being a mixture of both the Eastern and Western dialects. It took the place of the Hebrew, after the Babylonian captivity, and became the current language of Palestine. Common terms, such as "talitha cumi," "ephphatha," "sabach-thani," etc., are in this dialect, and the expression on the cross in Matt. 27: 46 is in the same tongue. It is regarded as beyond question that the Saviour employed this language largely in his ministry.

"Arum Palaestinum Boiss"

IN THE United States we think of an Easter lily as being as white as snow, but in the land of the Bible there grows, at Easter time, a lily similar to ours in shape and leaf, but with a flower as black as ink, in fact so black that ink can be made from it.

The spathe is covered inside with a plushy surface, and erect in the center is the great black spadix. From this latter the natives give the flower a name which, as near as it can be translated, means "Negro Fingers." These black lilies are usually found growing in loose stone piles, or among the rocks and along the edges of the rubble tumbledown walls, which to the peasants here are what the fences are to our American farmers.

If allowed to grow undisturbed the bulbs attain in a few years their full growth. The flowers often will grow so large that they will measure from the stem to the tip over a foot in length.

SAUL TRIES TO KILL DAVID

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR MAY 2. 1 SAM. 19

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"The fear of man bringeth a snare: but whoso putteth his trust in the Lord shall be safe." Prov. 29: 25.

Our faith in God ought to make all the difference in our lives, but in how many cases it leaves professing Christians in the same plight as others, who have no part or lot in Christ! We need not stay to elaborate the first clause of this memorable sentence, because evidences abound daily in our experience of the bad effect of the fear of man. Notice it is not man that entraps us, but the fear of man. If the pilgrim will only have sufficient strength of faith to ignore the fear of man, he will have little to fear from man. The lions are chained. The giant will measure his length on the ground before the first pebble slung from the lad's sling. The iron gate of the prison will open of its own accord. "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper, and every tongue that shall rise in judgment against thee thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord."

How safe are they that trust in the Lord! It is related that in the great war, a widow and her children dwelt in a house not far from the line of march. They were helpless and greatly feared the dreaded soldiers. So one night in prayer she put herself and her little ones under the wings of God; and in the morning they found that a large quantity of snow had fallen during the night, and had drifted so as to build up an impenetrable wall in front of their tiny cottage, entirely hiding it from view. Go on, child of God, doing thine accustomed work, not flinching from the post, standing like the sentry on duty, and thou shalt be as safe as in heaven itself. But thou must fulfil the condition of quiet faith!

The Framed Telegram

By Amos R. Wells

THE Greeks told a story about a wrestler who was defeated, and who in his chagrin was compelled to see the people raise a statue in honor of his victorious rival. Every night he went to this statue and wrestled with it. At last he succeeded in overthrowing it, but as it fell it tumbled on the jealous athlete and crushed him to death. This is nearly what happened to Saul, madly jealous of the young hero David. Saul wrestled with David's growing fame, and, though he did not succeed in overthrowing it, he did succeed in destroying his own happiness and finally his own life and dynasty. It is a true parable of all jealousy.

It has been said that "when a man's temper gets the best of him, it reveals the worst of him." Certainly that was the case with Saul. His angry jealousy grew till he plotted most basely against David and even entertained thoughts of murder. Once a soul begins to go down hill, it is like a rolling boulder. A fatal gravitation seizes it, and draws it faster and faster toward ruin. Jonathan was a true friend; he proved it by being ready to spend and be spent for David. The singer, Madame Solari, burst a blood vessel, and the only chance for her life was to go to southern France. She was in great trouble, as she depended on her voice for her livelihood. As she was making sad and hasty preparations for the journey Jenny Lind, the sweet Swedish singer, came and forced upon her a thousand dollars, chiding her for attempting to go away without telling her of her distress. Said Jenny Lind, "Remember, wherever you are, that friends have but one purse. God bless you!" That was a friendship worthy of Jonathan.

Blessed are the peacemakers! In making peace, though only a temporary peace, between Saul and David, Jonathan won a nobler crown than he could have gained by succeeding his father. Once an old man was counseling a young man who had been grossly insulted and was for demanding an apology at once. "Wait a little," said the sage. "An insult is like mud; it will brush off much better when it is dry." Many a time we need just such advice, and well for us if we have a Jonathan at hand to give it.

Saul allowed his foolish passions to drive him into frenzy, into temporary insanity. "Bad temper," said Charles Buxton, "is its own scourge. Few things are more bitter than to feel bitter. A man's venom poisons itself more than its victim." When Saul was in this evil plight, David drew him out of it by his sweet minstrelsy. He practiced the truth of the Mohammedan proverb, "Let us be like trees that yield their fruit to those that throw stones at them."

Once a Greenlander followed the murderer of his father, and in his hunt obtained lodging with a missionary, who knew his deadly errand, and began to tell him about Jesus Christ. The man was moved by the wonderful story, and exclaimed, "I do love Jesus; how can I prove it?" The missionary told him of the commandment about murder, and what Christ said about it, and how Christ also said, "If ye love me, keep my commandments." The avenger gave up his design, sent for his enemy and said, "I freely forgive you, for Christ has forgiven me." That is just what was done by David, the human ancestor of Christ.

Saul's javelin, quivering in the wall where David had been, is a good symbol of the Christian's many escapes from perils seen and unseen. When the steamer Atlantic was wrecked off Halifax a Boston merchant was on board and his family was greatly distressed. He managed, however, to reach the land, made his way to a telegraph office, and telegraphed to his family the one word, "Saved." That one word was enough for his rejoicing dear ones. When the merchant got home he had the telegram framed and hung in his office as a constant reminder of God's goodness. What Christian of us but should frame just such a telegram, in his grateful memory if not upon his wall?

Bishop Hannington, the noble missionary who was murdered by the blacks in the heart of Africa, told in the last entry in his journal how twenty ruffians seized him, took away his valuables, and then dragged him over the ground. Bruised in every limb, realizing that he was about to be murdered, he yet sang "Safe in the arms of Jesus." He was not rescued, as Michel rescued David, and yet he was indeed "Safe in the arms of Jesus," safe then, and safe forever.

The Danger of Being Armed

By Arthur H. Howland

IT WAS probably because Saul happened to have a javelin in his hand that he did not resist the evil impulse to attack David. If he had been empty-handed and the fit of anger had roused him to go and find a weapon, the physical and mental exertion of searching for it might have allowed the murderous impulse to die away. Still better, if he had had no weapon in the house he would have been saved from making the attack.

The law forbidding the carrying of weapons is just and wise. They form no essential part of a human being's equipment. And the same principle, recognized now in so many localities among citizens, will be at last applied to nations.

Not only this, but the possession of arms leads, by subtle suggestion, to a desire to fight. Scientific psychologists insist more and more strongly upon the power of suggestion, and in daily life we are constantly witnessing illustrations of the principle. People see a

How much greater was David with his harp, trying to soothe, than Saul with his spear, trying to kill!

Eloes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

The demon of jealousy was roused in Saul's heart. When the women came out from the city of Israel singing and dancing, saying: "Saul hath slain his thousands and David his tens of thousands," it was more than he could bear. With a certain commander of troops passed through our city the thoughtless people proposed a medal naming him "The Victorious" before he had entered the campaign. Other Jews showed signs of jealousy, but who can describe their feelings now that the victorious Jew has returned in humiliation and defeat? Perhaps Saul had many tastes of this galling experience as David returned again and again from his victories over the Philistines.

So "eyed David from that day forward." What some of the most beautiful teachings of the Bible are connected with God's watchful and guiding eye, the reference here is certainly to the Oriental belief in the "evil eye," that baleful faculty superstitiously attributed to certain persons, still believed in the Orient, of inflicting injury or bringing bad luck upon a person by looking at him. Many devices are in use today to prevent the evil effect of envy, anger, jealousy and malice from trees, houses, animals and human beings. A bit of rag is hung upon a fruit tree in a vineyard. Blue beads are used on horses, mules and children to catch and divert the first glance of the "evil eye." These beads are a regular industry and item of commerce. They are woven into the mane or tail of a horse; they decorate the trappings of a mule. A blue bead, a bit of alum and a bit of wood from the graveyards of Mecca hung on the forehead of a baby is supposed to be a most efficacious charm to guard against the "evil eye."

"That they should kill David," Saul's secret purpose was now openly avowed. The feud which was to last through generations was begun. Saul was afraid of David and every wise act of David was wilfully misunderstood. Jonathan openly loved David and delighted in him. Only in Oriental lands can such things happen in these days. Not infrequently, as in the case of Michal, is a bride used as a means of patching up a broken friendship.

"Jonathan called David." His loving friendship strove hard to effect a reconciliation. One of the loveliest sights in Syria is the reconciliation of two persons who have quarreled or been estranged for some known or unknown reason. After hours of reasoning and explanations two boys, or two men, are induced to embrace each other and exchange the kiss of reconciliation. Alas! in too many cases the "evil spirit" returns as in Saul's case and the javelins fly as before.

Your Grandfather

too, knew this trademark. So will your children's children. For 72 years it has been a famous name—a symbol of satisfaction. No other automobile has the same pedigree.

And today—what does it all mean to you? It means that once you know the CASE car—you'll want no other. For it's that famous car of "hidden values"—beneath the excellent lines of its body is real "stuff"—it's the kind of car that stands up day in and day out—on good roads and bad, on ups and downs—covering millions of miles all over the world. All rough roads are smooth roads in a CASE, with its deep upholstery and cantilever springs.

A Friend Indeed

It's a companionable sort of car—you can always depend on it. So it is a particular favorite among those who know CASE machinery, just because it is a Case car. In this car you find a permanent friend—one always at your service. It is built to wear—that is why its hidden parts are made with unusual sincerity.

But all its value isn't hidden—its beautiful lines, its extra equipment, its great comfort speak for themselves. Women folks all like the CASE car.

Then let us tell you fairly just what it will do. Nothing could satisfy you more.

Least in Price

Of popular priced cars the CASE car costs you least, we maintain, because we include extra accessories to the value of $110.25. These you'd have to buy later. If we left them out—as others do—the price would be $1,239.75. Including them our price is $1,350, with 5 per cent. off for cash. The CASE car has all the equipment other cars have—but also an Extra Tire and Tube on Rim with Tire Cover, Weed Non-Skid Tire Chains and 8-Day Clock.

Remember, too, that we save thousands—where others must spend—in selling, because our cars are sold by our own organization.

Where we spend these savings to make better cars is shown in our new illustrated catalog describing the CASE car. Send for this book—know the CASE car. Write today to Department 561.

LEADERSHIP TRAINING CLASS

Directed by FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Home Department Superintendent

The Home Department is for all shut-ins and shut-outs who cannot get to the school session. The requirement of such members is one-half-hour's study weekly of the Bible lesson in the Home Department Quarterlies furnished by the school. This study is recorded on a visitor's card. The voluntary offering covers the cost of the quarterly and more.

The department is an outreach of the Sunday school into the community, an extension course of Bible study. It reaches the infirm, the old, the young mother, nurses, physicians, Sunday clerics, soldiers, policemen, railway employees, commercial travelers.

It has been demonstrated as a department that furnishes substitute and often regular teachers, builds into church membership and attendance and adds steadily to the adult membership of the school.

1. Organization.

The Home Department requires a superintendent, secretary and treasurer, and visitors. It is inaugurated by the distribution of membership application cards at the church service after the pastor has presented the privilege of the department; by a visitation of the homes of the church and Sunday school members and by the pastor's efforts to enroll members for the Home Department during his visits; and by a visitation of neighborhood institutions from which members may be recruited.

A membership record book is required, also application cards and the quarterly report card for lesson study record. Birthday cards are desirable.

2. Visitors.

A visitor is needed for each ten or more members to visit the homes once a quarter with the new quarterly, gather up the record of the past quarter's work and the offering, to bring the social touch of the school to the home, and to offer to pray with the member who may be denied the privilege of attendance upon the church or Sunday school services.

It is usually best to divide the neighborhood into Home Department Districts, with a visitor for each district.

3. Family Worship Feature.

One of the new Home Department plans is the effort to introduce family worship into the home in connection with the daily Bible reading suggested in the Home Department Quarterly. The International Sunday School Association suggests a special record of these homes with cards of application that include the Family Worship feature.

4. The Department Social.

Quarterly or annual social of all Home Department members at the church or at some home gives opportunity of bringing the members together. The members will be glad to serve in committees to plan for this social, and the pastor and Sunday school superintendent can have those affairs come into contact with the Home Department. Where the work is divided into districts each visitor may plan for a quarterly gathering of the members within the district or a conference on the lessons, any necessary business and a social time.

In the large Home Department in Los Angeles, Calif., where there were a number of members in one of the hospitals, flowers were sent by the department on special days to the hospital members.

5. Birthday Remembrance.

Members of the Home Department have often passed the time of special birthday remembrance. For that very reason the annual remembrance of the birthday by the Sunday school through letter or visit will be the more appreciated. Forms of such birthday remembrances can be obtained from "The Sunday School and the Home," or from Goodenough & Woglam Co., 122 Nassau Street, New York.

6. Library Privileges.

The Home Department visitor should see that library privileges are extended to the Home Department members. The school should have a special parents' library for this purpose. Lists of such books can be obtained from a leaflet prepared by Mrs. W. F. Heath and published by the Sunday School Times Company, Philadelphia, or from Mrs. Isaac F. Russell, 436 Greene Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y. The Boys' Messenger Corps or Boy Scouts or Sunshine Girls can be used in delivering these books.

7. Home Department Day.

This should be observed annually through a sermon by the pastor in the church service and by a special program in the Sunday school. Reserved seats should be arranged and a flower pinned on each member as a recognition. Mother's Day is another occasion when the Home Department can be specially emphasized.

8. Parents' Department.

An extension of the Home Department to include all parents through a Parents' Department is a recent plan, the purpose being to see that every parent is visited and definitely attached to the Home Department, a father's or mother's class, or a parent's association. This is a promising field for Home Department extension of plan and effort.

Specialization book for Home Department workers, one of the following: The Home Department of Today (Stebbins); For Home Department Workers (Ferguson); The Sunday School and the Home (Brown); Home Classes and Home Department (Hazard); Home Training in Religion (McKinney); Home and Family Worship Pamphlets (International Sunday School Association).

China Orphans Want to Help Belgium's Orphans

THE Lord has so wonderfully blessed our little Chinese orphans (now forty-one boys and girls), that our hearts go out to the orphans of other lands. We have thought and prayed as to Belgium, and now I write to ask if you think you can get for us twenty boys and girls, real, needy orphans from Belgium, and if so, when, how, to what point in the United States of America. I have a house offered already, rent free, in the Central States (Kansas), and will at once take needful measures of preparation, and to raise support, if I get a favorable answer from your committee.

ON THE PHOTOGRAPHIC ART

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

FOR the third time this year I have been to the Grand Central Palace for inspiration, and for the third time my mood—but I get ahead of my story.

On looking over the files (an interesting and sometimes profitable habit) I find that when I attended the Safety and Sanitation Exposition before Christmas it was raining; also that I was cross. Without looking back, I can remember that I had a horrible cold on the day of the Flower Show, and that I lost my way and rode around in silly, inefficient circles. When I learned that I was to attend the International Exposition of Photographic Arts and Industries on the afternoon of April 3, the closing day, I made up my mind that this trip to the Grand Central Palace would be a pleasant trip, and I convinced myself, with sound arguments, that nothing unpleasant would happen. "I'll go smiling," I said, "and write a happy article, no matter—"

April third—the date sounds rather like songbirds and flowering plants, and perhaps a gentle shower, with a far-off delicately-tinted rainbow—April third dawned exceedingly cold and very misty. I was glad that I was wearing a winter suit with a fur collar. As I walked to the station the wind tossed me around in a malignant playfulness, and as I boarded my train for the city, tiny snowflakes began to fall—April third!

I left the train in the first flurry of a young blizzard. As I wended my way off toward, I remembered that the exposition did not open until eleven o'clock and that the snow would be quite deep by eleven. The thought was hardly comforting and my faint smile died miserably.

When I finally started the snow was deep! Because it was the third of April I was wearing pumps. The cars blocked, and the subway was a long, long walk—or so it seemed. I had a wildly extravagant desire to call a taxicab, a desire which I killed economically before it had grown to very huge proportions. When I arrived at the gray building that loomed ferociously through the white snowflakes, I wished that all expositions were closed and that some giant from the green and gold fairy tale book might shove the Grand Central Palace gently into oblivion. I pushed heavily, with much rustling of damp skirts, through the door.

SOMEHOW, no matter how blue I am, the great hall always makes me feel cheerful. There is a certain dignity to the wide steps, a certain height from the floor to the ceiling, a certain grace and cleanness to the white-pillared balcony that is charming. There always seems to be a vague breath of music somewhere in the corners; there always seems to be a brightness of flowers somewhere to relieve the severity of the columns and the walls. And then the booths, with their church-fair exteriors and wonderful toy-shop interiors, are always fascinating. These thoughts crowded my mind as I walked up the broad steps; but as I passed the first booth a man behind it called out to me and distracted my attention.

"Are you interested in amateur or professional photography?" he asked. All the nice thoughts flew out of my head, and I remembered with a bewildered rush of emotion that I was only concerned with my wet pumps, my damp suit, my cold hands.

"I'm not interested in either of them!" I nearly snapped. Then I felt better.

On the left hand side of the staircase as I came in was a wall that, at a distance, seemed a blur of small squares and large squares, of soft grays and sharp blacks and rich sepias. I purchased a program and hurried in that direction. There were in all (according to the program) six hundred and forty-five pictures in the contest. As I walked along, it seemed to me that there were a great many more. The burlap wall, which I think was either dark gray or dull brown or deep green (for I only remembered that it made a good background) was completely covered with some of the most wonderful photographs I have ever seen. There were portraits, views from all over the United States, and some very peaceful pictures of Old World towns that are being swept by the storm of war.

The first picture that I noticed was the gray print of a young man's face. It was an interesting face with a strong chin and great eyes that were strangely vivid in expression. He wore a checked cap, and, I believe, a checked mackinaw. I wondered about him.

The next picture that caught my attention was one of the prize views. It was a large sepia in a brown frame of an old man driving a team of horses through a lonely White Mountain road. I think that the name was "Homeward Bound."

A NEW YORK picture that looked very familiar was a remarkable photograph of one of the commonplace scenes that a great many people would have ignored. It was called the "Ferry Entrance," and it showed a cab with a sad-looking horse standing just under the shadow of a dark shed. It was a misty picture, and the impression that I received was that of a rainy twilight in November. Very often I have waited at the ferry entrance on such a day.

I have just time to tell you about another view that impressed me. It was so soft and melty looking that it gave the effect of a charcoal drawing. The lines faded into each other with vague shadows and soft masses. It was a winter landscape.

From the gallery of exhibits I passed on to the booths that ran through the room like columns of well-behaved tin soldiers. I had very little time (just as I have very little space now), but several unique things caught my attention. I saw a tiny camera the size and shape of a dollar watch, that took a picture about the size of a postage stamp—a remarkably clear picture; and in the same booth I saw a small black box, 2 1/2 x 3 3/8 x 1 inch thick, which can easily be carried in a small pocket, and I was told that detectives and officers of the law considered it invaluable. It is very practical, for it loads in the daytime and can be snapped without attracting attention. The picture when printed is 1 1/2 by 7/8 inches and can be easily enlarged.

Flashlight pictures have had a horror for me ever since as a very small child some well-meaning grown-up set one off and very nearly frightened me into a convulsion; but there were some remarkable flashlight outfits at the exposition. One of them was made especially for photographing wild animals in their homes, and I saw some really wonderful pictures of deer, and bears, and raccoons walking unconcernedly in the wood. By some arrangement of wires, which my mind is too unscientific to understand, the animal snaps its own photograph.

I wish that I could explain in detail all the things at the Grand Central Palace, but I came away with the bewildered sense of not having seen them all. I wish that I could tell about everything I did see, but my vocabulary is limited. However, when I went home, damp and mused up, but strangely self-satisfied, I dragged out an old camera that I have owned—passively—for years, and sat dreaming over it, late into the night.

Bran as a Luscious Laxative

Pettijohn's is a wheat-and-banana food made luscious and efficient. It is made by rolling the terrier bran into flakes of soft white wheat.

There is 25 per cent of unground bran hidden in this delicacy. And bran helps keep folks well. Eat it thrice a week for a little while. Note how it brightens days and lessens the need for drugs.

Bran alone isn't tempting, but in this form it's delicious. Try it.

Which of these two Cars would you suppose is the most popular Automobile in America?

FOR THE LIFE OF US, WE CAN'T TELL.

CERTAINLY IT RESTS BETWEEN the two—for if a demand that is more than four times the capacity of our big 25-acre plants is any indication, the most popular automobile in America surely is a Reo.

WHEN WE DECIDED, in response to an insistent demand, to design a Six and make it the Reo way, we were told that the new Six would prove a dangerous rival to the popularity of the famous Reo the Fifth.

OF COURSE WE DID NOT THINK SO—else we would not have made two models. If we could have seen how a better car than Reo the Fifth could be made at its price—$1050—of course we would have made that kind of a car.

BUT WITH MORE THAN 40,000 Reo the Fiftths on the roads and more than 40,000 delighted owners proclaiming its merits at every possible opportunity, we believed that it was the best automobile in the world in its price class.

FOR REO THE FIFTH OWNERS are not merely satisfied owners. They do not feel they got merely 100 per cent. value. They are delighted owners and their enthusiasm as they tell of the performance, the consistency and the almost unbelievably low upkeep cost of their car, is that of men who feel they have gotten a great deal more than they paid for.

AND SURELY THEY DID! When you consider that the total administration sales and advertising expense of the Reo Motor Car Company is less than three per cent. (3%) you will realize that the buyer of a Reo automobile gets more actual—intrinsic—mechanical value for his every dollar than he can get in any other automobile—or in any other commodity, for that matter.

WHY, WHEN WE MADE THAT ASSERTION recently, it staggered men in other lines of business. They wrote us they had always considered the automobile business an extravagant business.

WE REPLIED that it had been with some—but they are no longer in it. And it had been with some buyers—but they didn't buy Reos!

REO CARS ARE FULL VALUE—and so the possession of a Reo is an asset. It is a necessity, a convenience and an economy. Pays for itself over and over again by multiplying the efficiency of its owner by three. Makes it possible for him to be in three times as many places in a day—to oversee three times as much work or three times as many plants or men or whatever he has to do.

AND SO WE FELT NO CONCERN for the popularity of that wonderful Reo the Fifth, the car that has by common consent been called "The Incomparable Four." Without advertising from us, still its 40,000 friends would keep its fame alive, and create a demand for all we could make.

BESIDES, WE HAD NO INTENTION of making our favorite second in our ads or our considerations. Certainly not in production. Like the mother's first-born, it always must occupy first place in our hearts. Why, Reo the Fifth, more than any other product of the Reo plants made the Reo reputation what it is. You know that.

BUT STILL FOLKS SAID—dealers especially—that the new Reo Six at its sensational price would prove a dangerous rival for the popular idol.

WELL, FOR THE LIFE OF US we can't say at this moment which of these two Reos is best liked by buyers.

WHEN WE TELL YOU that the demand for both is hopelessly in excess of our ability to supply, you will understand that it is impossible to gauge, with any degree of exactness, the relative demand.

REO DEALERS ARE WIRING from everywhere, "Ship more Fours—and Sixes." "Ship more Sixes—and Fours." One day's batch of mail and telegrams seems to show that the Six is gaining on the Four; the next batch brings requests for Reo the Fifth that stagger us!

WE ARE MIGHTILY PLEASED and proud that our judgment has worked out so accurately. We made the Six for an entirely different class of buyers. A class who wanted Sixes, who were willing to pay the difference for the difference in cars. And as the difference is just that—why, how could the two Reo models compete with each other?

WHEN WE ANNOUNCED THE SIX we were, of course, anxious to set forth its merits just as favorably as possible. Yet we could not say it was superior at any point to the Four—the splendid Reo the Fifth. For we had incorporated everything we had learned in that model. And so we could only say for the Six that it was just as good as the Four—and that it was a Six.

WE HAD NO THOUGHT of ever replacing that great Four with this great Six. Nor have buyers—evidently. One chooses the Six, the next a Four. Or rather the next two—for our output of the four-cylinder model is twice that of the Six—and the demand is relative.

WE ESTIMATED that about twice as many would want a car at $1050 as would feel willing to pay $1385. And we were exactly right—our records show that the ratio holds, even if the supply doesn't!

WONDERFUL—THIS DEMAND. Truly wonderful. It is unprecedented even for Reo. And you know from the day the first Reo was made we have never been able to make enough cars to supply all who wanted Reos.

FROM THE DAY REO WAS ORGANIZED we have never stopped building. Always a force of masons and carpenters is adding to the Reo plants. Today they cover twenty-five acres. In arrangement, lighting, sanitation, laboratory and manufacturing equipment the Reo plants are pointed to by experts as "The Model Automobile Plants."

AND YET WE CANNOT supply the demand for Reos of either model. Must be a wonderfully good product to command such a market. Must be. In no other way can you account for it.

NOW JUST A WORD—that same word of warning we must always sound in a Reo ad. Don't delay!

THERE WON'T BE, CAN'T BE, ENOUGH REOS TO GO 'ROUND.

WHEN WE TELL YOU that in March we shipped nearly twice as many Reos as in May last year. That in January, February and March we were unable to store one automobile—or keep up with the demand;—

WHEN WE TELL YOU that today orders are coming into Lansing in a veritable flood, every dealer begging for an increase in his allotment, and that the total is more than four times the number of Reos we can make;—

WHEN WE TELL YOU THESE THINGS—and you know the Reo word, like the Reo product, may always be taken at par—you will realize that you cannot afford to wait another day.

IF YOU WANT A REO—Six or Four—if you want it for early spring delivery, then you must place your order with your local dealer now. Have him tell you his allotment and his delivery dates. He can count on those and no more.

HAVE A DEFINITE DATE SET for the delivery of your car—and feel easy in the knowledge that you have obtained the greatest automobile value it is possible to obtain—whether you have selected for your car the Reo Six, the "Six of Sixty Superiorities," or Reo the Fifth—"the Incomparable Four."

"BILLY SUNDAY

The Man and His Message"

Authorized by MR. SUNDAY

MANY have criticized the unconventional methods of Billy Sunday, but the sobering fact remains that he has led 300,000 men and women to a profession of Christianity.

Serious men and women the country over are asking, "What manner of man is this?" This book, written by Wm. T. Ellis, LL.D., provides the answer. It not only tells the story of Sunday's eventful life, gives a keen analysis of his manner and methods, traces his remarkable success as the most conspicuous Christian leader in America, but it also contains the heart of his message arranged by subjects and published by special agreement with Mr. Sunday for the use of copyright material and photographs which could be used only with his permission.

Preaches Religion in Homely Phrases

"I never preach a sermon until I have soaked it in prayer."—BILLY SUNDAY

Mr. Sunday is tremendously in earnest. His utterances are vivid. His epigrams, like his stories, are of the homely Lincoln sort that people remember. He bars the truth and makes it enter and stick. The crowds follow him. They come to hear a man preach a strong Gospel, which can meet the real need of the human heart.

"Billy Sunday, the Man and His Message," is an intensely interesting book because it deals with a subject of the greatest human concern in a new way.

THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER

Copyright, 1914, by ELEANOR H. PORTER. All rights reserved, including the right to translate into all foreign languages

POLLYANNA stared frankly. "Jimmy Bean Pendleton, whatever in the world are you talking about?" she demanded.

The young man laughed shamefacedly.

"No wonder you don't know. It wasn't very lucid, was it? But I don't think I've been really lucid myself since yesterday—when I found out from Jamie himself."

"Found out—from Jamie?"

"Yes. It was the prize that started it. You see, he'd just got one, and—"

"Oh, I know about that," interrupted Pollyanna eagerly. "And wasn't it splendid? Just think—the first one—three thousand dollars! I wrote him a letter last night. Why, when I saw his name, and realized it was Jamie—our Jamie—I was so excited I forgot all about looking for my name, and even when I couldn't find mine at all, and knew I hadn't got any—I mean, I was so excited and pleased for Jamie that I—I forgot—er—everything else," corrected Pollyanna, throwing a dismayed glance into Jimmy's face, and feverishly trying to cover up the partial admission she had made.

Jimmy, however, was too intent on his own problem to notice hers.

"Yes, yes, 'twas fine, of course. I'm glad he got it. But, Pollyanna, it was what he said afterward that I mean. You see, until then I'd thought that—that he cared—that you cared—for each other, I mean; and—"

"You thought Jamie and I cared for each other!" exclaimed Pollyanna, into whose face now was stealing a soft, shy color. "Why, Jimmy, it's Sadie Dean. 'Twas always Sadie Dean. He used to talk of her to me by the hour. I think she likes him, too."

"Good! I hope she does; but, you see, I didn't know. I thought 'twas Jamie—and you. And I thought that because he was—was a cripple, you know, that it wouldn't be fair if I—if I stayed around and tried to win you myself."

Pollyanna stopped suddenly and picked up a leaf at her feet. When she rose her face was turned quite away.

"A fellow can't—can't feel square, you know, running a race with a chap that—that's handicapped from the start. So I—I just stayed away and gave him his chance; though it 'most broke my heart to do it, little girl. It just did! Then yesterday morning I found out. But I found out something else, too. Jamie says there is—is somebody else in the case. But I can't stand aside for him, Pollyanna, I can't—even in spite of all he's done for me. John Pendleton is a man, and he's got two whole feet for the race. He's got to take his chances. If you care for him—if you really care for him—"

But Pollyanna had turned, wild-eyed.

"John Pendleton! Jimmy, what do you mean? What are you saying—about John Pendleton?"

A great joy transfigured Jimmy's face. He held out both his hands.

"Then you don't—you don't! I can see it in your eyes that you don't—care!"

Pollyanna shrank back. She was white and trembling.

"Jimmy, what do you mean? What do you mean?" she begged piteously.

"I mean—you don't care for Uncle John, that way. Don't you understand? Jamie thinks you do care, and that anyway he cares for you. And then I began to see it—that maybe he did. He's always talking about you; and, of course, there was your mother—"

Pollyanna gave a low moan and covered her face with her hands. Jimmy came close and laid a caressing arm about her shoulders; but Pollyanna again shrank from him.

"Pollyanna, little girl, don't! break my heart," he begged. "You care for me—any? Is it that, and you don't want to tell me?"

She dropped her hands and faced him. Her eyes had the haunted look of some wild thing at bay.

"Jimmy, do you think—he cares for me—that way?" she entreated above a whisper.

Jimmy gave his head an impatient shake.

"Never mind that, Pollyanna. I don't know, of course. How could I? But, dearest, that isn't the question. It's you. If you don't care for him, and if you'll only give me a chance—half a chance to let me make you care for me—" He caught her hand and tried to draw her to him.

"No, no, Jimmy, I mustn't! I can't! With both her little palms she pushed him from her.

"Pollyanna, you don't mean to care for him?" Jimmy's face whitened.

"No, no, indeed—not that way," faltered Pollyanna. "But—don't you see?—if he cares for me I'll have to—to learn to—some way."

"Pollyanna!"

"Don't! Don't look at me like that, Jimmy!"

"You mean you'd marry him, Pollyanna?"

"Oh, no!—I mean—why—er—yes, I suppose so," she admitted faintly.

"Pollyanna, you wouldn't! You couldn't! Pollyanna, you're breaking my heart."

Pollyanna gave a low sob. Her face was in her hands again. For a moment she sobbed on, chokingly; then, with a tragic gesture, she lifted her head and looked straight into Jimmy's anguished, reproachful eyes.

"I know it, I know it," she cheered frenziedly. "I'm breaking mine, too. But I'll have to do it. I'd break your heart, I'd break mine—but I'd ever break his!"

Jimmy raised his head. His eyes flashed a sudden fire. His whole appearance underwent a swift and marvelous change. With a tender, triumphant cry he swept Pollyanna into his arms and held her close.

"Now I know you care for me," he breathed low into her ear. "You said it was breaking your heart, too. Do you think I'll give you up now? Any man on earth? Ah, dear, you little understand a love like mine if you think I'd give you up now. Pollyanna, say you love me—say it with your own dear lips!"

For one long minute Pollyanna lay unresisting in the fiercely tender embrace that encircled her; then, with a sigh that was half content, half renunciation, she began to draw herself away.

"Yes, Jimmy, I do love you," Jimmy's arms tightened, and could have drawn her back to him, but something in the girl's face foiled him. "I love you dearly. But I couldn't ever be happy with you and feel that—Jimmy, don't you see, dear? I'll have to know—that I'm free first."

"Nonsense, Pollyanna! Of course you're free!" Jimmy's eyes were murderous again.

Pollyanna shook her head.

"Not with this hanging over me, Jimmy. Don't you see? It was my mother. Don't you see? It was my mother. And all these years she's lived a lonely, unloved life in consequence. If now he should come and ask me to make that up to him, I'd have to do it, Jimmy. I'd have to—I couldn't refuse! Don't you see?"

But Jimmy did not see; he could not see. He would not see, though Pollyanna pleaded and argued long and tearfully. But Pollyanna, too, was so durately, though so heartbroken, and

"Jimmy, dear," said Pollyanna at last, "we'll have to wait. That's all I can say now. I hope he doesn't care; but I don't believe he does care. I've got to know. I've got to be sure. We'll just have to wait, a little, till we find out, Jimmy—till we find out."

"All right, little girl, it'll have to be you say, of course," he despaired. "But surely never before was a man kept waiting for his answer till the girl loved, and who loved him, found out the other man wanted her!"

"Very well, I'll go back to Boston, of course," acceded Jimmy reluctantly. "But you needn't think I've given up—because I haven't. Nor I shan't give up just so long as I know you really care for me, my little sweetheart," he affirmed, with a look that sent her palpitating into retreat, just out of reach of his arms.

JEN PENDLETON TURNS THE KEY

Unfortunately for all concerned, however, this state of affairs was not of long duration; for, as it chanced, John Peleton, in whose unwitting hands lay the key to the situation, in less than a week after Jimmy's visit turned that key in the lock, and opened the door of doubt.

Ollyanna, looking into his face, felt a sudden sinking of the heart.

"Oh, Pollyanna, wait a minute, please," called the man, hastening his steps. "You're just the one I wanted to see. Come, can't we go in here?" he suggested, turning toward the sunnerhouse. I want to speak to you — out something."

There was no answer. John Pendleton strode into the summerhouse and dropped himself into a rustic chair without even waiting for Pollyanna to seat herself—a most unusual proceeding on the part of John Pendleton. Pollyanna, stealing a nervous glance at his face, found it so like the stern, sour visage of her childhood's remembrance, that she uttered an involuntary exclamation.

"Yes, Mr. Pendleton."

"Delightfully agreeable specimen of humanity, wasn't I?"

"I—I liked you, sir." Not until the words were uttered did Pollyanna realize just how they would sound. She strove then, frantically, to recall

She strove then, frantically, to recall or modify them and had almost added a "that is, I mean, I liked you then!" when she stopped just in time; certainly that would not have helped matters any!" She listened then, fearfully, for John Pendleton's next words. They came almost at once.

"I know you did—bless your little heart! And it was that that was the saving of me. I wonder, Pollyanna, if I could ever make you realize just what your childish trust and liking did for me."

Pollyanna stammered a confused protest; but he brushed it smilingly aside.

"Oh, yes, it was! It was you, and no one else. I wonder if you remember another thing, too," resumed the man, after a moment's silence, during which Pollyanna looked furtively but longingly toward the door. "I wonder if you remember my telling you once that nothing but a woman's hand and heart or a child's presence could make a home."

Pollyanna felt the blood rush to her face.

"Y-yes, n-no—I mean, yes, I remember it," she stuttered; "but I—I don't think it's always so now. I mean—that is, I'm sure your home now is—is lovely just as it is, and—"

"But it's my home I'm talking about, child," interrupted the man, impatiently. "Pollyanna, you know the kind of home I once hoped to have, and how those hopes were dashed to the ground. Don't think, dear, I'm blaming your mother. I'm not. She but obeyed her heart, which was right; and she made the wiser choice, anyway, as was proved by the dreary waste I've made of life, because of that disappointment. After all, Pollyanna, isn't it strange," added John Pendleton, his voice growing tender, "that it should be the little hand of her own daughter that led me into the path of happiness at last?"

Pollyanna moistened her lips convulsively.

"Oh, but Mr. Bondleton, I, I."

Once again the man brushed aside her protests with a smiling gesture.

"Yes, it was, Pollyanna, your little hand in the long ago—you and your glad game."

"Oh-h!" Pollyanna relaxed visibly in her seat. The terror in her eyes began slowly to recede.

"And so all these years I've been gradually growing into a different man, Pollyanna. But there's one thing I haven't changed in, my dear." He paused, looked away, then turned gravely tender eyes back to her face. "I still think it takes a woman's hand and heart or a child's presence to make a home."

"Yes; b-but you've g-got the child's presence," plunged in Pollyanna, the terror coming back to her eyes. "There's Jimmy, you know."

The man gave an amused laugh.

"I know; but—I don't think even you would say that Jimmy is—is exactly a child's presence any longer," he hazarded.

"N-no, of course not."

"Besides—Pollyanna, I've made up my mind. I've got to have the woman's hand and heart."

His voice dropped and trembled a little.

"Oh-h, have you?" Pollyanna's fingers met and clutched each other in a spasmodic clasp. John Pendleton, however, seemed neither to hear nor see. He leaped to his feet, and was nervously pacing up and down the little house.

"Pollyanna"—he stopped and faced her—"if—if you were I, and were going to ask the woman you loved to come and make your old gray pile of stone a home, how would you go to work to do it?"

Pollyanna half started from her chair. Her eyes sought the door, this time openly, longingly.

"Oh, but, Mr. Pendleton, I wouldn't do it at all, at all," she stammered a little wildly. "I'm sure you'd be much happier—as you are."

The man stared in puzzled surprise, then laughed grimly.

"Upon my word, Pollyanna, is it—quite as bad as that?" he asked.

"B-bad?" Pollyanna had the appearance of being poised for flight.

"Yes. Is that just your way of trying to soften the blow of saying that you don't think she'd have me, anyway?"

"Oh, n-no—no, indeed. She'd say yes—she'd have to say yes, you know," explained Pollyanna, with terrified earnestness. "But I've been thinking—I mean, I was thinking that if—if the girl didn't love you, you really would be happier without her; and—"

At the look that came into John Pendleton's face, Pollyanna stopped short.

"I shouldn't want her if she didn't love me, Pollyanna."

"N-no. I thought not, too," Pollyanna began to look a little less distracted.

"Besides, she doesn't happen to be a girl," went on John Pendleton. "She's a mature woman who presumably would know her own mind." The man's voice was grave and slightly reproachful.

"Oh-h-h! Oh!" exclaimed Pollyanna, the dawning happiness in her eyes

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

Joy of the Christian Life

Christian Endeavor and Baptist Young People's Meetings for May 2. I Peter 1: 3-12. (Consecration meeting)

THE first great joy is the joy of salvation, which is like a fountain in the soul springing up and sparkling with gladness.

The next joy is that of being kept by the power of God in perfect safety. A banker once said to a faithful clerk: "I have willed you $10,000, which you are to receive on my death." This was good news to the young man; it filled his heart with joy. But the banker added: "I have decided to give you the interest on this amount—$600—during my life, which will help care for you meanwhile." Our Christ has made us joint heirs with him in an inheritance "incorruptible, undefiled and that fadeth not away." We do not enter upon this possession until we have reached our majority, or have finished our earthly service. But the interest on the bond is the keeping power of joy. "The joy of the Lord is your strength." Christ's joy in us makes our joy full. The joyful Christian is strong to resist temptation, to conquer evil propensities, to do valiant service in the vineyard. Sorrow and fear weaken manhood, while joy makes us bold as a lion.

A lady who had broken her porcelain crucifix said to a friend: "What shall I do? My dear Christ is broken in pieces!" The friend replied: "Do not grieve. I keep the Saviour always in my heart. He is Christ in me, the hope of glory." So we keep an eternity of joy in the soul when our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ.

Peace is love in repose. Joy is love in motion. It is the one infinite ocean of divine love, shoreless and fathomless, into which flow the individual rivers of human affection. Hope of one day sailing into the haven of rest is joy sublime; a heaven to look forward to with the assurance of perfect peace and happiness.

The Promise of Personal Holiness

Epworth League Lesson for May 2. Jer. 31: 33; I John 1: 9; I Thess. 5: 23, 24; II Cor. 7: 1.

LIBERATING a man from prison is only the first step in his reformation. Pardon must be followed by purity, if the manhood is redeemed. Inwardness must be changed, cleansed, leaping forth in a flash of ineffable joy and relief. "Then you love somebody—" By an almost superhuman effort Pollyanna choked off the "else" before it left her delighted lips.

"Love somebody! Haven't I just been telling you that I did?" laughed John Pendleton, half vexedly. "What I want to know is—can she be made to love me? That's where I was sort of—of counting on your help, Pollyanna. You see, she's a dear friend of yours."

"Is she?" gurgled Pollyanna. "Then she'll just have to love you. We'll make her! Maybe she does, anyway, already. Who is she?"

There was a long pause before the answer came.

"I believe, after all, Pollyanna, I won't—yes, I will, too. It's—can't you guess?—Mrs. Carew."

"Oh!" breathed Pollyanna, with a face of unclouded joy. "How perfectly lovely!"
